

Jury convicts high school teacher of sexual abuse

The Associated Press

ANNAPOLIS, Md. — A former high school teacher was convicted Wednesday of sexually abusing three of his students in school.

The Anne Arundel County Circuit Court jury deliberated slightly more than two hours before finding Donald Price, 48, guilty on seven counts of sexual abuse.

Before the verdict, Price admitted he had sex with two students, and told the court he now realized that was wrong.

Price, who taught at Northeast High School in Pasadena, a Baltimore suburb, could be sentenced to 76 years in prison.

The trial began Tuesday with graphic testimony from three former students who said Price had sex with them as often as seven times a week.

The students testified about performing sex acts on a catwalk above the auditorium, in the football stadium press box, in classrooms, storage rooms, the library, dressing rooms and a hallway.

Price, a social studies teacher who also served as a drama club adviser and girls softball coach, resigned shortly after he was indicted last May. The case attracted national attention after he appeared on several tabloid-style television shows, saying he had sex with seven students over the last 20 years.

One of those students was Price's wife, Patricia, the only other witness called by the defense. Mrs. Price, now 25, said she had an affair with Price when she was 17.

"I was 17 years old. I knew what I was doing," she said.

Neither Price nor his attorney contested the three counts of unnatural and perverted sex practices, and one count of fourth-degree sex offense with a child under age 16.

Testifying Wednesday, Price admitted he had sex with two students, but denied allegations by a third woman that they had an affair while he was her drama club adviser.
