Corpus Christi teachers want cameras in class

The Associated Press

CORPUS CHRISTI — Teachers who credit electronic surveillance for making children better behaved on buses are urging the school board to take the next step — placing cameras in classrooms and halls.

"We want to make sure it's a usable tool and not something to introduce just for the sake of introducing it," said Alfred Ortiz, security director for the Corpus Christi Independent School District.

The suggestion may be part of a report sent to the district officials next month. Ortiz said he also may ask the district to buy metal detectors and drug-detecting dogs.

"What we've got to look at is the affordability — the cost factors here. It's a rather expensive proposition," he said.

The teachers who suggested cameras on campus were impressed by the effect of surveillance systems on school bus riders, Ortiz said.

The videotape also would be valuable in evaluating student-teacher disputes, said Marvin Spears, principal at Driscoll Middle School in Corpus Christi.

"It could work both ways also. If there's a problem in the classroom, the videotape might show the teacher could be doing something wrong," Spears said.

Rising violence, discipline problems and crime on school campuses nationwide have prompted some larger metropolitan school districts to begin using metal detectors, drug sweeps and security guards.

Video surveillance systems are being installed in 10 high schools and one middle school in the Dallas Independent School District, security director C.W. Burruss said.

Houston Independent School District officials also began using a camera system at one school this year.

But some administrators at those schools say the cameras shouldn't be considered a panacea to school violence.

"I don't believe putting cameras and metal detectors all over the place is going to solve your problems," said Michael Stiles, principal of Sunset High School in Dallas.

"I mean, they've got security cameras at (convenience stores) and there are still robberies and shootings," Stiles said. "If the violence is going to take place, it's going to take place. My view is that adults are the key to stemming violence in our schools."
