PTTS working to ease traffic jams on campus

By Kim Horton
THE BATTALION

Experimenting with solutions to ease the traffic flow on campus, Texas A&M University officials recently posted police officers around campus to direct cars and pedestrians.

PTTS Director Tom Williams said the pedestrians and vehicles dropping and picking up students have delayed the schedule of campus buses. Concerned about the unsafe situation and the inability of the buses to maintain their schedules, Isenhart proposed the idea of placing officers on Ross street to direct traffic.

Two officers were placed at the intersections of Ross St. and Spence St. and Ross St. and Ireland St. to facilitate traffic flow during the breaks between classes.

"The students look like big schools of fish crossing, weaving, and bobbing throughout the streets," said Woody Isenhart, coordinator of shuttle bus services.

Bill Kuykendall, enforcement supervisor of Parking, Transit and Traffic Services, said there has been an increase in pedestrian traffic this year. "This is a temporary condition but it will remain in effect if it proves to better the service to the students," he said.

This past week, a videocamera filmed the pedestrians and traffic at the Ross and Ireland intersection.

Kuykendall said this documentation would warrant whether or not to continue the traffic and safety experiment.

"Student traffic engineers were gathering data to keep records of the problems and to help find solutions," said Williams. "We don't just write tickets."
