More food for thought on privatization

While I was amazed that most students misunderstand the issue of privatizing several of the satellite Food Service operations, I was absolutely dumfounded that Ronald Hornback, a member of the Student Senate who had studied the issue for two years, demonstrated the same misunderstanding.

Privatization, as proposed in this case, is the contracting out of the Underground Food Court and other facilities to a corporation such as Marriott, the hotel giant, to bring in franchisees such as Taco Bell and McDonald's.

Why do we need Marriott to handle these franchisees? The answer is, we don't.

The University could administer the franchise rights directly if it wished. However, Marriott has made a lucrative offer to the University administration for these rights. This is all well and good except for the fact that Marriott is not just making a grant to A&M. Over the course of the contract, it will make a very good profit — at our expense.

There is nothing wrong with making a profit from the students until you realize that this represents money leaving the University for no good reason at all. Marriott brings nothing to the table that we can't get for ourselves. All Marriott is offering, in effect, is a high interest short term loan. So why would our administrators consider such a proposition?

The answer to that might be found in the preemptive firing of the director of Food Services for no apparent cause, the s-lending of the food service managers and staff, and the potential that the chief bargaining agent for the University might have received or have reached an agreement to receive personal benefits from Marriott in exchange for the deal going through.

Where is The Battalion and the Student Senate when it comes to being our watchdog here?

I think Food Services should be more efficient. That is precisely why I am against destroying the economies of scale that make the board rates as reasonable as they are today.

I also like competition. But whether the operation is home grown or contracted out, competition ceases once the names are signed on the dotted line.

After that, it is a race for the contractor to make all the money he can before that two-year contract is over. Will he reinvest during this period for long-term benefits to the operation like what we have now? That would be like throwing money away from his perspective.

I understand that we, as students, do not have the time, interest, or business acumen to look over the contract adequately before we jump in bed with Marriott. That is why we must ask ourselves these fundamental questions now.

When there is a possibility that an administrator is not acting in our best interest, we must demand a thorough and complete investigation. We have only ourselves to blame if we don't. What will future classes think of us if we did any less?
