Athletics

The debate at UH is led by UH Faculty Senate President George Reiter. Reiter's concerns stem from his belief that a college is an educational institution rather than place for sports.

"Faculty wonder why we're supporting a piece of the entertainment industry and a training camp for the pros," George Reiter said in an article appearing in the Houston Chronicle. "What's it doing here? What's it got to do with education? The faculty's sense is that it is a misplaced priority."

Texas A&M faculty members, however, do not share the critical view of their UH colleagues.

Kaiser said, "I think what has happened up to this point in the faculty's perception is that the athletic department has brought favorable perceptions about the University. The most significant factor in the evaluation of the department would be if the objectives of intercollegiate athletics were complimentary with those of Texas A&M."

Penny King, assistant athletic director for business, said, "We have a very good relationship with our faculty. Many of them buy season tickets for our football games even though they still have to pay full price. I think that says a lot for the support our faculty gives the athletic program."

Some members urged caution in regards to the emphasis on the athletic program.

Smith said, "I think we should just be careful not to overemphasize the athletic program. But athletics provides us with a window to the public and to our former students that would be closed otherwise."

"Many former students identify with the athletic program, but end up supporting the academic side. It's a good way to portray the image of the university."

The UH debate comes a year after the faculties at Rice University and Southern Methodist University voted to move down one division in competition or remove athletics altogether. The boards of directors at both schools, however, decided to keep the schools at their current levels of competition.

The debates at the other schools around the Southwest Conference stem from their departments running deficits in the range of $2 to $4 million. Athletics at A&M, however, does not run a budget deficit.

"We've been very successful over the last few years with our budget," King said.

TEAC

Rouse said the tobacco company RJ Reynolds also began the advertising campaign "Don't Throw Your Butt On The Beach" after the center concluded cigarette butts were littering Texas beaches.

Taylor said TEAC usually participates in the Coastal Clean Up Program and the Great Texas Trash Off. However, due to scheduling conflicts, TEAC wasn't able to attend the trash off this year, she said.

Rouse said 35 states and 50 countries participated in the 1993 Coastal Clean Up program. In Texas, over 11,060 volunteers gathered 198 tons of trash from 183 miles of beach. Items such as bags of cocaine and a pregnancy test were found on the beaches.

Volunteers picked up 12 tons of trash from five miles of beach surrounding Matagorda Bay. Rouse said most of the trash is left by commercial fisherman fishing along the Gulf Coast.
