"With a lot of colleges, unless you are taking the heavy 18-hour loads, there are few conceivable ways to finish in four years," she

David Martin, an official in Measurement and Research Department, agreed and said that if a student chooses to co-op, they can be assured of a late graduation. In addition to the challenging

A&M curriculum, many students are forced to help foot the bill for their education, said Wanda Watson, an academic adviser in the general studies program.

"What we're seeing at A&M is a reflection of today's job market," she said. "As parents lose their jobs that trickles down to the students and they have to work to help put themselves through
