Beautiful fall days bring out worst in television sports junkie

It's Saturday, October 23, 1993, and it's another beautiful day in the Brazos Valley. The sun is shining, the birds are singing and children are playing in the street. It's a scene worthy of a Norman Rockwell painting.

For some people, however, this fall Saturday means only one thing: college football. This is the story of one person.

Billy Joe (the names have been changed to protect the innocent) rolled out of bed at approximately 11 a.m. on this particular day. He has promised a friend, Mr. Orange, that they would listen to the Texas A&M-Rice game on the radio, so he throws on some clothes, grabs his boom box and heads out to their favorite hangout spot.

Since he slept through breakfast, Billy Joe decided to stop at Freebirds and get a monster chicken burrito to tide him over until supper.

Once Billy Joe and Mr. Orange settled into their respective viewing positions, the fun began. Not only were they listening to the Aggie game on the radio, they were watching another game on television with the sound turned down.

This turned out to be extremely confusing. As A&M's Leeland McElroy was running back a kickoff for a touchdown, Billy Joe wondered aloud why the players on the television were in punt formation and not chasing Mr. McElroy like they should be. This sort of thing went on for the entirety of both games.

The day's early games provided very little in the way of dramatics, so there was plenty of time for idle chatter. The conversation centered on a plan to get A&M ranked high enough to have a chance to play for a national title.

"If Notre Dame, Ohio State, Miami, Alabama, Nebraska, Arizona, Tennessee, Auburn and Florida all lost at least one game and A&M won all of its remaining games," Mr. Orange surmised, "a number one versus number two matchup with Florida State in the Cotton Bowl is a definite possibility."

"Right," Billy Joe replied, laughing hysterically. "I think we'll see Rush Limbaugh wearing Birkenstocks and a tie-dyed mumuu before that scenario will unfold. Texas A&M should just take care of its own business and let the polls shake themselves out."

While this great debate rages on, the Aggies are polishing off Rice, 38-10. The offense, defense, special teams and Reveille all scored touchdowns.

Billy Joe, having shotgunned three or four Diet Cokes at halftime, has been content to spend the second half of the game practicing his belching technique, while Mr. Orange has attempted to listen to the game amid these paint-peeling screams.

This sort of behavior (belching, that is) is not uncommon to the football addict, especially when the game is a rout.

It's Billy Joe's way of saying, "I am man. Hear me roar."

Next on the docket is the ABC telecast of the Alabama-Mississippi game, a contest featuring great defenses. The highlight of this game was that ended.

This brings up another characteristic of the football addict, which is watching a game to its conclusion even if the person doesn't care a thing about either team.

Why did Billy Joe and Mr. Orange watch the game? Because it was on, that's why. It's almost like they're afraid the game won't continue unless they are tuned in to the action.

Following a half-hour break to get caught up on the day's scores and highlights, the two comrades settle in for the ESPN game featuring Syracuse and Miami.

This was to be the caper of a productive day of football watching. Unfortunately, they never even made it to the half.

Some heathen life forms wanted to watch (gasp!) a baseball game. They said something about it being important, like it was a World Series game.

After careful deliberation, Billy Joe relinquished the TV and went bowling with Mr. Orange and some of their friends. After rolling a rather pitiful 73, Billy Joe called it a night.

There you have it. The sad, wretched, unfulfilled life of Billy Joe Robidoux, football addict. It's a situation just begging to be corrected.

No cure has been found of yet, but some treatments that have proven effective in combating this insidious malady include camping, doing homework, jogging and listening to Wayne Newton CDs.

The question remains: Will Billy Joe ever get life? Stay tuned...
