streets running adjacent to the site.

"There is no kind of access to Bonfire," Klouda said.

"It would be nice to be close enough to actually see it. I'm not talking so close I'd singe my eyebrows or could roast marshmallows, but close enough to feel like I'm actually participating in Bonfire."

Andrea Nixon, president of Networks and a committee member, said they are working with the Bonfire coordinators and drafting two proposals to increase accessibility to the Bonfire site.

"One thing they could do is build a stage high enough so the students could see it," Nixon said.

"Another thing they could do is build a walkway to a raised platform near the site. I think both of these options are feasible because they could be disassembled and would be a one-time cost."

One issue the committee has already dealt with is Midnight Yell practice.

Under old policies, students in wheelchairs were allowed on the track with their guests but because of the fights that occurred last year, students were restricted to bringing only one guest in order to keep the number of students on the track to a minimum.

Nixon said this policy kept students in wheelchairs from being with their friends and family until a compromise was reached with the University, allowing people in wheelchairs to take three guests with them onto the track.

"We want to be with our friends just like everyone else," Nixon said.

"Imagine being separated from your friends and possibly your family. From a disabled person's perspective, it makes it difficult and almost as though we're not invited."

Klouda and Nixon said the committee will also look at the accessibility of events held in G. Hollie White Coliseum such as Muster, athletic events, concerts and graduation.

Klouda said the coliseum is neither accessible nor safe.

"At athletic events, we're seated at the bottom of the sections," Klouda said.

"It ends up being very inconvenient for everyone because we're blocking the aisles and people are tripping over us. Also, the ramps are very dangerous."

Klouda said that at last year's Muster, students in wheelchairs were offended because they were forced to sit on a stage off to the side.

"Our whole purpose is to blend in," Klouda said. "At Muster, we were isolated from such a thing would happen," he said.

Koldus said A&M has been a major part of his life and will always hold a special place in his heart.

"The fondest part of working at A&M has been my relationship with the students that I've had the pleasure of meeting," he said.

Brian Walker, student body president, said students will miss Koldus and will remember the great sacrifices he has made to the student body.

"I can't put into words what Dr. Koldus has done for this university," Walker said. "That building is the least we could give to Dr. Koldus for all of the many contributions he has given us."

Dr. William Mobley, chancellor of the Texas A&M University System, said dedicating the building after Koldus was a humble way of thanking him for his forgotten contributions to the University.

"Right in the heart of the institution and right along the side of the Rudder name will be the Koldus name signifying the great impact the Kolduses have had on literally tens and thousands of students and former students of this university," he said.
