Ban on pregnant cheerleaders reversed

The Associated Press

HEMPSTEAD - Under threats of legal action and a loss of federal funds, Hempstead's school board has reversed its ban on pregnant cheerleaders. The policy change Monday night didn't signal they were just trying to avoid a lawsuit. The board believes that the federal government is wrong in robbing local communities of the power to deal with the incidence of unmarried students becoming pregnant," the board said in its resolution.

any dramatic change of heart. Rather, trustees said,

Trustees on Sept. 28 voted to cut three pregnant students from the cheerleading squad. A fourth pregnant cheerleader had an abortion, which allowed her to return to the squad. But she has not yet done so. None of the three banned cheerleaders has sought to rejoin the squad. But the ban prompted the National Organization for Women to file a formal complaint with the U.S. Department of Education civil rights section. Austin NOW leader Hannah Riddering cited Title

9 of the 1972 Civil Rights Act, which says schools that receive federal money may not bar students from "any extracurricular activity on the basis of such student's pregnancy, childbirth, termination of pregnancy or recovery therefrom."

At Monday night's meeting, Riddering warned the board it was jeopardizing federal funding by continuing to bar pregnant students or fathers-to-be from holding elected school office.

Trustees, who said they didn't intend to violate federal law, adjourned into closed session and emerged with the resolution. Under its new policy, the board will consider each student's case individu-

"But in no case will a decision be imposed upon a student if, after consultation with the district's attorney, the decision would violate the law," the board's statement said.

Model company copies Air Force spy plane

The Associated Press

FORT WORTH – The model airplane company that unveiled a reasonably accurate version of the then-secret Stealth bomber says it's uncovered the Air Force's next generation spy plane. Using evidence that includes unusual vapor trails in Texas, unexplained sonic booms in California and a reported sighting off the coast of Scotland, some aviation watchers have concluded that the Defense Department is testing a replacement for the SR-71 Blackbird. That spy plane was retired from service in 1990.

Testor Corp.'s new model, the SR-75 Penetrator, puts aerospace enthusiasts' speculation into a three-dimensional form, the Fort Worth Star-Telegram reported in Monday's editions.

An Air Force spokeswoman dismissed the company's theory.

'No such aircraft exists," Maj. Monica Aloisio said. "Someone's making a lot of money off something, but it certainly is not an Air Force model or program.'

In an interview from his San Diego office, Testor product developer John Andrews told the Star-Telegram that he believes the new spy plane model is 70 percent to 80 percent accurate.

The Rockford, Ill., model maker has established a track record in making the defense community uncomfortable.

In 1986, Testor released a reasonably accurate plastic version of the then-secret F-117 stealth fight-

Although Testor incorrectly called it the F-19, its replica gave an early glimpse of the futuristic fighter two years before the Air Force officially acknowledged its existence.

Andrews, whose research led to the early-version F-117 and the company's newest model, also scored in the late 1950s with a version of the U-2 spy plane.

Andrews said he complied with requests to keep the model off the market until the 1960 crash of U-2 pilot Gary Powers in the Soviet Union ended any need for Testor's version of the new spy plane is actually two aircraft the SR-75 and a companion craft, the XR-7 Thunder Dart. Andrews suspects that the Air Force intends to use the SR-75 as an airborne launching platform for the smaller, faster Thunder Dart.

Officials at Lockheed, which Testor identifies as the new plane's manufacturer, declined to discuss the subject.
