Cardiologists say many health patients don't get best medications from doctors

The Associated Press

CLEARWATER, Fla. — Many doctors are not prescribing the right drugs for congestive heart failure, which afflicts 3 million Americans and costs $60 billion a year to treat, a cardiologist said Tuesday.

Family doctors are less likely than cardiologists to use the drugs, raising questions about health reforms in which general practitioners are expected to serve as "gatekeepers," said Dr. Michael Bristow of the University of Colorado School of Medicine in Denver.

In that role, family doctors would make decisions about when patients should be referred to specialists.

In a study to be published this spring, Bristow found that only 24 percent to 30 percent of patients with heart failure were getting the drugs that have proven to be the best remedy. The information came from drug-company marketing surveys, he said.

Cardiologists now agree that virtually all patients with heart failure should receive the drugs, Bristow said. The underuse of the drugs suggests that overall treatment for heart failure is not adequate in many cases, he said.

The study also found that cardiologists' patients are about twice as likely to receive the drugs as are the patients of general practitioners, he said. The findings will appear this spring in the Journal of Heart and Lung Transplantation, he said.

Dr. William Coleman, president of the American Academy of Family Physicians, disagreed with Bristow.

"It's one of the first things you learn to treat as a senior medical student," he said. He said family doctors are perfectly qualified to treat it. "When somebody's a specialist, they want to make something more complex than it is," said Coleman, who has a family practice in Scottsboro, Ala.

Coleman said he believes many patients with mild or moderate heart failure do not need the drugs. Bristow said cardiologists are absolutely certain that the drugs are helpful even in mild cases. "I've never seen a consensus like this," he said.

The drugs — angiotensin-converting enzyme inhibitors, or ACE inhibitors — have been available for nearly a decade. Within the past two years it has become clear they are superior even for treatment of mild or moderate heart failure, Bristow said.

"The best treatment of heart failure is not being done now," he said at the annual science writers' meeting sponsored by the American Heart Association. "If those patients never get to a specialist, they will not be taken care of properly."

Heart failure refers to impairment of the heart's ability to pump blood. It is one of the leading causes of hospitalization, amounting to $5.5 billion in annual hospital costs alone. The total costs of caring for it is about $60 billion, Bristow said.

Dr. James Moller, the heart association's president and a pediatric cardiologist, agreed with Bristow that ACE inhibitors were not being used widely enough.

"I think the heart association should be doing a better job of getting our guidelines out to physicians," he said. "We should be going to the academy of family physicians' meetings and discussing this."

Recent studies by the Rand Corp. and Merck & Co., which is among the makers of the drugs, reached similar conclusions about the underuse of ACE inhibitors.

Scale model of Branch Davidian complex created

The Associated Press

WATAUGA — A tire hangs from a tree branch. Chickens are frozen in place in their coop. And trash is scattered everywhere. Newspaper tear sheets linger beneath window sills, and piles of scrap metal and broken wooden crates are stacked randomly around the yard.

The Branch Davidian compound has been re-created — on a 1:76 scale, where every foot equals 76 feet.

Leo Palitti's scale model was created at his home in this Fort Worth suburb for use in the San Antonio murder trial of the compound's surviving members.

Palitti, a 38-year-old design student, said he toiled over the foot-by-4-foot model for more than 280 hours, completing it in 16 days. With the help of a magnifying glass and several aerial photos of the compound, he painstakingly copied even the most marginal details of the facility to ensure authenticity.

"We had to figure out the scale without a lot of help. There was a lot of guessing," he said. "I was only given five dimensions — one across the front and a few along the side."

Palitti said he never imagined that his hobby of making dioramas and scale models could play a significant role in the trial. Although he started on the project in December, Palitti said he realized the magnitude of his work only last week, when he saw photos of the complex on a "Prime Time" broadcast.

"That's when I thought, 'Gee, this is a really big deal,'" he said. "It didn't really hit me until then."

Palitti made the model at the request of Fort Worth attorney Jeff Kearney, who is representing Jaime Castillo, a 25-year-old Branch Davidian. Palitti and Kearney met more than a decade ago when Palitti was a student at Texas Christian University.

Kearney had heard about Palitti's dioramas and scale models and went to check out some of his work.

"It was obvious he was good," he said.

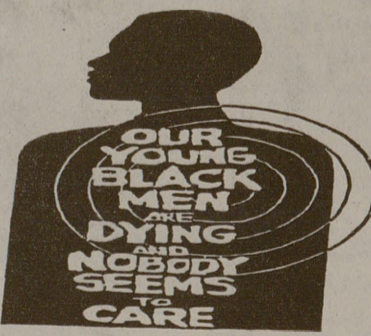

When Kearney asked Palitti about building a model of the Branch Davidian compound, Palitti agreed.

"He had approached me quite a while ago about doing the model," he said. But Palitti didn't get back from Kearney until several months later. "He called me Christmas Eve and said he needed it by the 12th of January."

Palitti, a full-time student at a local technical school, is proud of his work. He started making dioramas and miniature models about 21 1/2 years ago, when he saw an elaborate model railroad put together by members of Mid-Cities Rail Barons, a club that works with model trains.
