

Buffalo changes name to Blue Star to honor Cowboys

The Associated Press

BUFFALO — What has become the most unfortunately named Texas town during Super Bowl week is abandoning its moniker again this year in support of the Dallas Cowboys.

Buffalo, Texas will be known as Blue Star until after Sunday's Super Bowl rematch between the Cowboys and Bills, Mayor Byron Ryder declared Monday.

"We felt like we needed to do this because we pulled the Cowboys through to win last year," Ryder said.

There are no Bills fans in Buffalo to push around this year. High school basketball coach George Chaika, a Buffalo, N.Y., native, has moved to Warren, about 100 miles northeast of Houston, since the Cowboys' 52-17 victory last year.

Blue Star's transformation started less than 24 hours after Dallas beat San Francisco 38-17 for the NFC Championship, Ryder said.

Residents were busy first thing Monday, constructing the large blue star to be posted in the town's main intersection. Smaller stars were to cover any sign of Buffalo in the tiny Texas town.

Last year, vendors hawked T-shirts and hats emblazoned with the temporary name, and restaurant menus were beefed up with special dishes dedicated to Dallas, about 100 miles to the north.

Ryder had hoped the Houston Oilers, who bowed out of the playoffs early for the seventh straight year, would be involved in the name-change this time. Buffalo is about halfway between the two largest Texas cities.

federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations legislation, called RICO.

The decision means:

- Anti-abortion groups and individuals sued successfully over their conduct can be forced to pay triple damages. The NOW lawsuit alleges criminal violations dating back to 1982.

- The leaders of anti-abortion groups may be sued successfully as conspirators, even if they are not physically present when illegal conduct occurs.

- Federal judges may invoke RICO to issue injunctions against anti-abortion activities.

The court last year ruled abortion clinic operators cannot invoke the Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871 in suing those who block women's access to abortion clinics.

That ruling led to an effort in Congress to provide more federal protection for women seeking abortions. The House and Senate have passed separate versions of the Freedom of Access to Clinics Act, and the legislation will be before a conference committee when Congress reconvenes.

The court's new decision falls far short of resolving all legal issues surrounding anti-abortion activities. Just last Friday, the justices agreed to clarify how far courts and local governments may go in restricting protesters outside clinics.

That case, to be decided by July, pits the free-speech rights of protesters against the rights of women seeking abortions and of abortion clinic employees to be free from harassment, intimidation or other illegal conduct.

Anti-abortion leaders, such as Terry, call themselves civil rights activists and distance themselves from those responsible for such violent acts as the killing of Dr. David Gunn outside a Pensacola, Fla., clinic last year.

Monday's decision was hardly surprising. The court consistently has refused to narrow how the broadly worded RICO law is applied.

Enacted in 1970, RICO was aimed at organized crime. But increasingly it is used in lawsuits involving just about any business dispute.

Writing for the court, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist said RICO can be invoked even when the alleged crimes have no economic motive.

RICO makes it a crime for "any person employed or associated with any enterprise in ... interstate or foreign commerce ... to participate in a pattern of racketeering activity," Rehnquist wrote.

In another action Monday, the court refused to use a case from Michigan to rein in the fees airports charge airlines for using runways, passenger terminals and other services. Those fees topped $3 billion in 1991.
