wrong every day.

"Remorseless criminals have no conscience, which is one of the most important aspects of the community," Earle said.

Ron Going, a senior philosophy major, said people need to make a choice between ethics and morality.

"Pretty much what we are at is a point where we need to determine whether we enforce ethics or morality, or objectively look at the law," Going said. "As an idealist, I feel bending the law is breaking the law, and that should be prosecuted to the fullest extent."

Earle said people need to be responsible for what they do and consider the consequences on the whole.

Ethics is a rising tide of concern that Earle said he would like to see taught in the home, which is not always possible.

Society can't go backwards in time, he said, and if ethics can't be taught at home, then school is the next best place.

"Ethical values and sex education should be taught at home, but we can't take a chance that someone might slip through," Earle said. "We need to educate everyone."

Sabrina Dompier, a senior English major, agreed.

"I didn't think ethics really mattered, but I agree with him," Dompier said.

"I didn't agree with his idea on the issue of teaching sex education at school, but overall, it was a good speech."

Chris Williams, programming executive for MSC Political Forum, said Earle was asked to speak because of an increased interest in the ethics of political figures brought on by the prosecution of U.S. Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison.

However, Earle declined to discuss the Hutchison case or any other pending case.

Dead for 16 years, Elvis still reigns as king

The Associated Press

Men and women wave their hands in the air ecstatically, first spelling, then calling out the name of the man they have come together to praise. A Pentecostal revival? No, an Elvis festival.

A father pacing before his son undergoes a serious operation feels someone touch his shoulder, gets a "lovely, warm feeling" inside and knows everything is going to be all right.

Did he think it was an angel upon his shoulder? No, Elvis Presley.

More than 16 years after his death, hundreds of thousands of devoted Elvis fans still revere "The King," holding festivals in his name, decorating their homes with his pictures, even praying to him.

Now, a British television documentary making its U.S. premiere Friday night raises the question of whether Elvis worship has become a religion.

"The King and Me," produced by Tullstar Productions and part of the weekly series "The Human Factor," will be shown on The Faith and Values Channel. The cable network, which reaches 20 million homes, will show the half-hour documentary again on Monday and next Thursday.

How well the late rock 'n' roll superstar has stayed alive in the popular imagination is indicated in the alleged sightings of Elvis regularly reported in supermarket tabloids. "The Two Kings," a new book from Bantam Books, satirizes the phenomenon by comparing Elvis to Jesus.

Several national polls in recent years have found from 6 percent to 16 percent of Americans believe Elvis still may be alive.

"The King and Me" producers estimate up to a million people worldwide are devoted followers of Elvis. Those interviewed make it clear they do not consider Elvis to be God, and some note Elvis himself would discour-
