Japan launches first satellite rocket

The Associated Press

TANEGASHIMA, Japan - Japan's first major rocket roared into space Friday, a venture the country hopes will lift it into the commercial satellite business.

Analysts predict the cost of the H-II's leading-edge technology will make it too expensive to compete in the tough satellite-launching market, currently dominated by Europe's Arianespace.

The H-II rocket's long-anticipated liftoff came after three days of delays due to stormy weather and problems with a temperature control duct. It was originally scheduled to lift off Tuesday from Japan's southwestern tip.

About 15 minutes after takeoff it released a dish-shaped experimental craft that is to measure temperatures and pressures as it re-enters the atmosphere to help Japan develop a small space shuttle.

The orange and yellow H-II was developed completely in Japan at a cost of $2.4 billion.

It frees Japan from U.S. veto power over launches of third-nation satellites, a condition set in the licensing agreement for U.S. technology used in Japan's previous rockets.

Each H-II costs about $145 million, nearly twice as much as one of Europe's workhorse Ariane 4 rockets.

The National Space Development Agency of Japan hopes to compensate with a reputation for reliability. The problems surrounding the H-II's maiden launch didn't help on that score.

Privately, some space officials say the H-II reflects a lack of direction in Japanese space policy rather than a concerted effort to break into the commercial launching market.

The rocket has few potential military applications, and also is inappropriate for manned space travel.

NASDA officials say some of the H-II technology may be applied to future planes and cars. Analysts predicted such commercial spinoffs of technology may be the space agency's main source of revenue from the H-II.

In the commercial satellite field, the Japanese rocket has a number of competitors.

Since plans for the H-II were made nearly a decade ago, the U.S. space shuttle and Europe's Arianespace dominated the small commercial satellite launching business.

Since then, China, Russia and two American companies have entered the growing market, driving down prices and creating a glut of launch vehicles.
