Academy Awards asks stars to keep speeches short

The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Long-winded Academy Award speeches have become as much of an Oscar fixture as the red carpet, as the producer of Monday night's show wants to put a cork in the annual celebrity gabfest.

From indulgent thank-you's to political scoldings on Tibet and Haiti by award presenters, the Oscar shows have been distinguished as much by moving moments as moving pictures.

This year, Steven Spielberg's "Schindler's List," with a leading nomination, is considered a heavy favorite.

Other favorites include Hunter as best actor for "The Piano" and Tom Hanks as best actor for "Philadelphia." The show broadcast by ABC, begins at 6 p.m. local time.

With little apparent suspense, the top categories, the real drama could be what Hollywood celebrities do — and do not — say.

There were not many run-of-the-mill acceptance speeches in the awards ceremony, but presenter Richard Gere, Susan Sarandon and Tim Robbins made up for it with two surprise partisan statements.

"We had worked it out behind the hand," Robbins said about the statements on America's treatment of HIV-positive Haitians he and Sarandon made.

Gere lectured on human rights violations in Tibet. None of the three were invited back.

A year earlier, politics played a supporting role to director Jonathan Demme's rambling, seemingly endless address on his "Silence of the Lambs" win.

In an attempt to streamline the program, producer Gil Cates showed Oscar nominees videotaped examples of good acceptance speeches, and bad ones.

He also asked that award presenters stick to their written scripts.

All of the presenters have been sent copies of their prepared Oscar introductions. The performers' comments on the scripts are welcome. Wholesale improvisations are not.

"The clear implication is we expect them to say what we have given them to say," Cates said.

"I don't want to go to Anthony Hopkins and say, 'Tony, don't screw around.' But every once in a while you get somebody who's naughty."

Oscar presenters are not allowed the same latitude given Whitney Goldberg, the show's host. The median-actress has said she won't hesitate to share her thoughts on political topics, and any variety of improvisations are possible.

"Every host has been political," Cates said. "They're paid to be amusing and run the show. Billy (Crystal) did it. Johnny Carson did it and Bob Hope did it."

Winners are asked to keep their acceptance speeches under 45 seconds, and Cates hopes most winners head for the wings after 30 seconds.

"...Glorious"
Los Angeles Times

From the intensity of a brass movement to the ethereal quality of a woodwind solo, orchestras have the power to move the soul. For almost a century, the Pittsburgh Symphony has captivated audiences across the world with its musical brilliance and unmatched artistry. Now you can hear why the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra has been called one of the greatest orchestras in the world, as it takes the stage under the baton of the legendary Lorin Maazel.
