

Air strikes hurt NATO's stance of impartiality in Balkans

The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — NATO's bombing of Bosnia Serbs thrusts the United States and its allies across a major political frontier, eroding their claims of neutrality and pointing toward a larger role in the two-year-old civil war.

Coming just a week after American military leaders had shunned the use of force in the Muslim enclave of Gorazde, the bombing also served to highlight the debate within the administration about how deeply the United States should get involved.

After months of confusion and hesitation, the clear signal now is that President Clinton is ready to use force in Gorazde and the five other designated safe areas to stop Serb nationalists and force them back to the negotiating table.

Secretary of State Warren Christopher said Monday "I don't rule out" extending the Sarajevo model of NATO's no-artillery zone to Gorazde and the other safe havens.

He demanded that the Serbs reverse their drive on Gorazde and return to the positions they held March 30.

For months, the United States had insisted that it was merely an honest broker among the warring parties and wasn't taking sides, even though NATO forced the Serbs to lift their siege of Sarajevo and American warplanes shot down Serb planes in a no-fly zone.

Now, having carried out the first bombing in the 45-year history of NATO, it's difficult for the alliance to continue asserting neutrality.

"Once we start using air strikes against one party, it is clear that this whole notion of neutrality is a fiction, has been a fiction for some time," said Andrew Bacevich, head of the Foreign Policy Institute of the Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies.
