Vending machines upgraded

Aggie Bucks to be accepted across campus by Fall 1994

By Christine Johnson THE BATTALION

Most vending machines on campus will accept Aggie Bucks by the fall semester, officials in the Fiscal Department said.

Andy Bland, manager of data processing for the Fiscal Department, said the department's goal is to have the card readers ready by the end of August.

However, not all vending machines will be updated to take Aggie Bucks. There are 360 vending machines on campus, and 140 of them will be able to take Aggie Bucks, he said.

"Some don't warrant it," Bland said.

"Only the areas that have the highest traffic and are most accessible to students will be converted."

Tom Taylor, assistant vice president and controller for the Fiscal Department, said A&M uses the money it gets from vending machines and Aggie Buck usage to cover the cost of converting vending machines to take Aggie Bucks.

He said when some vending machines were converted for testing there was an increase in sales.

Sara Smith, a senior accounting major, has lived on campus since her freshman year. She said she would definitely buy more Aggie Bucks because of the added convenience.

"It will be so convenient," she said. "It's a lot better than carrying around change."

Bland said plans for converting laundry and copy machines is in the department's future, but no dates have been set.

Thomas Williams, director of Parking,

Transit and Traffic Services, said there are no plans for any parking garages to take Aggie Bucks except for the University Center Parking Garage, which already accepts them.

Williams said the use of Aggie Bucks is causing problems in the garage, he said. Instead of the students using the garage at night to attend club meetings as intended, they are using it to go to class during the day, he said.

"It has deteriorated operations to the point where we will be closely monitoring during the fall," he said. "We have to prevent visitor parking in that garage, and steps that have to be taken will be, but there are no plans yet."

Locations for the converted vending machines include Harrington Classroom Building, Kleberg Animal and Food Science Center, Heldenfels Hall, the Commons, MSC, Kyle Field, Zachry Engineering Center and some residence halls.

Sister school undergoes expansion

A&M-Corpus Christi to become a four-year university this September

By Tracy Smith THE BATTALION

Texas A&M University-Corpus Christi will become a four-year university in September, with an enrollment increase of over 1000 people.

Dr. Robert Furgason, president of A&M-Corpus Christi, said regulations have limited the school to only 400 freshmen in the fall.

The university was previously open only to juniors and seniors.

The state legislature decided to make the school a four-year university in 1989.

"The different characteristics and backgrounds of our new freshmen should provide for a well diverse group of students," he said. "We are expecting 70 percent of the freshmen to be women and 40 percent minorities."

Dr. William Mobley, A&M System chancellor, said the decision to make A&M-Corpus Christi a four-year university was an excellent move by the legislature.

school for more than two years.

"Until you move to four-year university status, you never really get to see the benefits involved with that expansion," he said. "It gives a sense of enthusiasm and comradery that is lacking from a two-year school."

Chuck Steward, assistant of public affairs at A&M-Corpus

Sergio Olivares, student government president at A&M-Corpus Christi, said the school has a lot to gain from incoming freshmen men and sophomores.

"One of our main goals is to get students involved," he said. "We want everyone to become an active part of the university."

"Due to a receptive turn of registration and the first student orientation last week, our positive attitude has been strengthened," he said.

"We are having to learn a lot, but we go but are excited to have the opportunity."

Students at the main A&M campus said giving more students a chance to attend a four-year school is a situation in which everyone can prosper.

Rachel Campbell, a senior petroleum engineering major, said she realizes the importance of attending a four-year school and is excited for the A&M-Corpus Christi students.

"After attending A&M for the last four years, I have realized how important it is to start to finish at the same University," she said. "I hope the Corpus Christi students can get the same feeling of pride and tradition that I have received here at A&M."

"I expect A&M-Corpus Christi to eventually become one of the more rapidly growing universities."

— William Mobley, Texas A&M System chancellor

Furgason said he is excited about the switch to a larger institution, and feels the change will help students by providing the "true college experience" found by attending the same

"I expect A&M-Corpus Christi to eventually become one of the more rapidly growing universities."

Christi, said the change should also provide a vital link connecting the school with the community.

"The opportunities that go along with becoming a four-year university will allow the college a chance to integrate with the general public, industry and local schools," he said. "By opening lines of communication with the public, we expect education to thrive and to provide support for the school."

"For the long-term, we also see an increase of jobs as the University expands, helping the area as a whole," he said.
