Cushing will undergo renovations A&M to restore '30s look

Texas A&M will renovate the E.B. Cushing Library in spring 1995.

The Cushing Library opened in 1930 as the first library on campus and is now connected to the Sterling C. Evans Library.

Designed by Texas architect C.S.P. Vosper, it was considered one of the nicest buildings on the campus.

David Chapman, Texas A&M archivist, said A&M expanded faster than planned, making a new library necessary to accommodate the campus' growth.

"By the late 1960s, the campus had outgrown Cushing," he said. "It became merely an appendage of the larger Sterling C. Evans Library."

For the next few years the building served a variety of purposes, including housing the office of the dean of education.

Time and numerous remodeling attempts took their toll on the building. The roof leaked and the walls were cracking. The air conditioning system, installed in the 60s, became increasingly unreliable.

The Cushing Library will undergo renovations to protect the collections housed in the building.

Chapman said the material in the Cushing Library is being moved to make room for renovations.

Archives that have been in the Cushing Library for 20 years are now in room 210 of the Evans Library.

"Most heavy items will be put in various places in Evans Library," Chapman said. "The remainder of the material will be moved into the old Texas Instruments building where we have temporary use of space."

The University plans to start renovations on Cushing this April.

"The tentative plans are to restore the library back to the grandeur of its original construction in the 1930s," he said.

Concrete floors will be put in where there are currently no stacks. This will triple the capabilities of the building.

Dr. Charles Schultz, Cleme archivist, said that by April 1996, part of the renovated building should be completed.

"There are now eight levels of stacks that will become floors of compact motorized shelving," he said. "By April 1996, two of the four floors planned to be completed."

Chapman said when the renovations are done, material will be moved back into the building.

Special collections, manuscripts and archives will be combined into one large division moved back into Cushing unit, he said.

Schultz said Cushing will house offices and research areas.

Dr. Fred Heath, dean and rector of Evans Library, said renovation of the Cushing Library provides a welcome opportunity to restore an edifice of great historical significance here at Texas A&M.
