STATE & LOCAL Border blockade deters illegal alien

El Paso notes drop in crime rate; immigrants find new passages

Paso border blockade appears to be halting illegal crossers who come from just inside Mexico, but is not stopping migrants who travel longer distances to the United States, according to a study released Wednesday.

The blockade also appears responsible for small drops in El Paso's crime rate and school enrollment, and in the number of abuse complaints against the Border Patrol, the study found. But the report says Operation Hold-the-Line, which also is being considered for San Diego, did not prevent the illegal entry of people traveling from interior Mexico to find work. Instead, those migrants merely found new spots to cross into the United States, said University of Texas demographics professor Frank Bean.

In addition, the blockade did not prevent people with legal border-crossing cards from working in El Paso, illegally, once they had entered.

"People with regular employment, even if they were working illegally, were not substantially deterred," said not tried to prevent most

For those reasons, the blockade is not a catch-all way to stop illegal immigration, but just one part of a complex issue, the researchers found.

"Because all the resources are shifted to the border, once you're in El Paso you have less fear of being detained," said researcher David Spener.

"And if you legally cross, but then illegally work, you have much less fear of being detained."

The report was done for the U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform, an independent panel created by Congress and headed by former U.S. Rep. Barbara Jordan from Texas.

The commission, which is scheduled to issue wideranging recommendations September 30, will study the report closely, said spokesman in Washington.

Under the blockade, begun last September, agents are placed along the 20-mile stretch of border between El Paso and Ciudad Juarez, Mexico, to prevent crossings.

Before, the Border Patrol had crossings across the Rio Grande, but instead tried to catch illegal immigrants already in the city. After the blockade first began in September, the number of illegal immigrants apprehended dropped to about 200 a day from 700 a day. Most of the people prevented from crossing appeared to be from Juarez, including street vendors, Bean said. The blockade also proved to be highly labor-intensive, stretching the Border Patrol's manpower to the limit, Bean noted. 'It was just barely possible in El Paso, and they used some overtime especially in the beginning," Bean said. Because agents had to sit in their cars for long periods of time — perhaps an entire shift of eight hours — the blockade also caused anxiety and boredom, Bean said. The study found:

· Businesses in downtown El Paso were hurt by the blockade. Across the entire city, however, the effect on businesses was negligible.

• There was a "substantial reduction" in petty crime, Bean Paso police were able to deplofficers differently, which me have resulted in a sm reduction in more serious crim · El Paso school enrollme and hospital births both dropp slightly. But the findings we tentative and would need long study, Bean said. The blockade's deterrer effect seemed to lessen as month passed but still remained. •Delays in legal crossing procedures, or backups, led som people to cross illegally, Bean said. That led researchers to believe more Immigration and Naturalization Service worken were needed.

Because of severa publicized confiscations of lega border crossing cards short after the blockade began, son Juarez residents with the cards stopped using them, for feat their cards would be confiscate Such a phenomenon could have an impact on "trade a business issues," Bean noted.

· Because agents ceas stopping people in El Paso, then were fewer complaints harassment, Bean said.
