"It won't be spinning off by itself because the college is here to get the program moving," Stout said. "This particular transition is something both groups have wanted for some time and will be an added plus for students.

"The decision really just streamlined the programs so they can be responsible for their own business," she said.

Putman said while the two areas are now considered separate, the theater arts program is not officially labeled a department.

"They are still given the freedom to make changes and decide how their program will be run," she said.

Kelley said the freedom the program has received will provide more opportunities for the 60 students currently in the theater arts program.

"I would also like to see more students getting involved with the theater arts program," she said. "Our classes are open to all majors and anyone can tryout for the productions, you don't have to be a theater arts major."

She said the program will perform eight productions this year.

Four of the productions will be student-directed and six of them will have design work done by students.

The theater arts program will sponsor two theatrical series during 1994-95.

One will be presented in conjunction with the Aggie Players featuring faculty-directed shows.

The second, called the Studio Showcase series, will feature the work of junior and senior theater arts majors.

Mentors

Keith Garinger, principal of Jane Long Middle School, said the program offers good volunteer experience for students majoring in teaching.

"I strongly encourage any A&M students interested in teaching to participate in this program before doing their student teaching."

Maryanne McNamara, a coordinator for the project, said the project benefits all involved.

"It is a team effort," McNamara said. "The students learn from their mentors, and the mentors learn from each other and the students."

McClain said students and teachers develop relationships through the program.

"The teachers are impressed that they get to know the students in a new way," McClain said. "The students say that they see their teachers as real people."

Dr. Jane Stallings, dean of the College of Education, said the program is beneficial for all individuals involved.

"The program was designed to help students, but it also benefits teachers and volunteers," she said.

McClain said students have enjoyed participating in the program.

"They learned that other students face the same problems they do," McClain said.

He said more than 90 percent of the students said they would participate in the program again if given the chance.

Stallings said students also build better relationships with other students through the families.

"They say that they get to know their classmates better," she said.
