Habitat not planned, officials say

Wildlife Service misinformation victim, director says

AUSTIN (AP) — Gov. Ann Richards said Monday the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service should "abandon all plans" to designate parts of Texas as critical habitat for the golden-cheeked warbler.

Rogers said his agency has been the victim of "misinformation" by people who have stated that there is currently a proposed plan to designate parts of 33 Texas counties as warbler habitat. He said his agency only studying the idea and "may or may not" come up with a critical habitat proposal.

Rogers said "incorrect information" was given to the public and then adopted by politicians looking to bolster their campaigns by inciting the issue of landowners' rights. In a letter to Secretary of the Interior Bruce Babbitt dated Monday, Richards said implementation of the Endangered Species Act "has become overreaching that it undermines public support for protecting our wildlife."

Richards said a critical habitat designation would be an economic blow to the 33 Central Texas counties, which are considered the songbird's natural habitat in the United States.

Last month, more than 300 landowners converged on the Capitol for a rally against a federal action that would infringe on private property rights.

"The Fish and Wildlife Service hasn't proposed to designate critical habitat in any county, not one acre," Rogers said.

In a letter to Secretary of the Interior Bruce Babbitt dated Monday, Richards said implementation of the Endangered Species Act "has become overreaching that it undermines public support for protecting our wildlife."
