Career Center helps students explore future job opportunities

By Stephanie Dube
THE BATTALION

The Career Center offers many opportunities for students to explore their career options and plan their futures.

Dr. Leigh Turner, director of the Career Center, said the Center has many opportunities for students.

Among these is JOBLINE, a career resource network which provides registered students information on employers.

"This was started in January 1993, and we have had 3,500 jobs placed on it since," Turner said.

JOBLINE was initially devised for former students who could not return to the campus for job information. However, the Center later decided current students should also have access to the database, Turner said.

Today, students can make requests for on-campus interviews electronically. Students can then view the database later and see if they got the request, Turner said.

JOBLINE also includes information on summer jobs and internships, she said.

To register at the Career Center, a student must attend a placement orientation or watch a videotape.

Students must register with the Center to take part in many of the Center's opportunities, including JOBLINE and on-campus interviews, Turner said.

However, students do not have to be registered with the Center to talk with a career advisor attend a workshop, Turner said.

Many workshops are being offered this semester. These are workshops on interviews, resumes, graduate work experience, and search techniques.

Turner said one of the opportunities registered students may take part in is the on-campus interview.

Registered students must out their resumes on the Center's Disk Resume. The Center keeps a disk with the resume and the Career Center loads the student's resume into its database.

Geology, geophysics departments to combine

By Constance Parten
THE BATTALION

Next year's freshmen geology and geophysics students will take part in a newly implemented program geared to prepare students for the many changes taking place in these fields.

Steps began last November to combine the geology and geophysics departments into one department.

The new department will benefit both geology and geophysics students by expanding their knowledge base, said Jim Mazzullo, associate professor of geology.

"The geology students will have more physics and math than is required now," Mazzullo said, "and the geophysics students will have more hands-on geology training."

"There are so few programs that are combined like this one will be," he said. "Our students will have a much broader background. Basically, they'll be the best students in their field."

The new degree program will combine the student's first two years of study, similar to A&M's business and engineering programs' core curriculums.

The upper level courses will still be geared toward the student's particular field of study.

Dr. Philip Rabinowitz, interim head of the combined department of geophysics and geoscience, said the degrees will remain the same, only the requirements will change.

"Students will still receive a degree in either geology or geophysics," Rabinowitz said. "The names of the degrees won't change, the students will simply take different classes."

Texas A&M has been preeminent in producing students going into the petroleum field for many years, particularly in Texas, but times have changed Rabinowitz said, and the new degree plans must also change.

He said he hopes for a curriculum with more emphasis on environmental fields.

"We've been involved primarily in the petroleum field for many years," Rabinowitz said, "and we still have to have a strong presence, but the truth is the jobs just aren't there anymore."

"We want to do what is best for the students and prepare them for their futures," Rabinowitz said. "In order to do that, we have to prepare them to be good analytical thinkers. That is our main goal."
