ter of the National Organization for Women, said that acquaintance violence is hard to talk about.

"We try to educate women about self-defense, but when it comes to acquaintances, how can you know who is bad?" she said.

"What can you do?" Fedirchuck said that women have to always be aware.

"Especially at A&M, the 'Howdy' campus, you must be aware," she said. "It can be daunting for a woman walking alone at night to have a man yell 'Howdy' at her."

Fedirchuck said that women must always be on the defensive.

"The only person you can trust 100 percent is yourself," she said.

Betty LeMay, of UPD's crime prevention unit, said that women are too trusting.

"Women get in trouble because we are too trusting," she said. "We know we are good people, so we think everyone else is."

She said that women should trust their instincts to tell them if someone may be a threat.

"If your instincts tell you that something is wrong," LeMay said, "do something about it."

She said women may have to use their imagination to think of how they can get themselves out of a bad situation.

"Sometimes in these situations," LeMay said, "you have to use your brain to protect your body."

She recommended talking to the potential attacker until the women can find a way to get out.

LeMay said that many times women do not want to believe that someone they know can hurt them.

She said that women should consider new friends to be strangers, because they are not familiar enough with them yet.

"Women need to not be naive," she said. "They need to know that anytime, anywhere, anyone can kill them."

"Just because it is someone you know, doesn't mean they won't hurt you."

"I have chosen to leave the country to protect you, so that my presence will not be a pretext for unjustified acts," Cedras told the crowd.

As a result of Lt. Gen. Cedras' resignation, the final condition has been met by the Haitian military leadership to comply with the terms of the agreement former President Barthelemy worked out only hours before a U.S. invasion was to begin.

Cedras is gone, so too is Brig. Gen. Philippe Biamby, who resigned Saturday. Port-au-Prince police chief Michel Francois escaped in the dark last week to the neighboring Dominican Republic.

Cedras gave no time or venue for his exile, but U.S. Embassy spokesman Stanley Schrager listed Argentina, Panama, Spain or Venezuela as possible refuges. Schrager did not rule out the United States.

The crowd continually shouted the name of Jean-Bertrand Aristide, the man Cedras overthrew in September 1991.

U.S. State Department officials say Aristide, Haiti's first freely elected president, will end his own exile and return home Saturday.

Cedras said he decided to sacrifice himself to save Haiti.

"There's a lot more Haitians who want to sacrifice him," said Spec. 4 Charles Hill.

The U.S. military policeman said he now believed Haiti would be safer without Cedras, who was slow to cooperate with American forces in disarming the pro-military gunmen known as "attaches."

"The people are on our side," said Hill, 22, of Pembroke, Mass.

Hundreds of singing, branch-waving Haitians streamed up the hill to Cedras' neighborhood in suburban Petionville afterwards. The crowds included carnival bands, urging the general to leave now.

Walters said that access to programs is as important as access to buildings.

"Most people think that students who have disabilities are all in wheelchairs," Walters said. "There are people who are visually or hearing impaired. There are also people who have psychiatric, psychological, medical or temporary impairments. Recently, there have been a lot of improvements in access to programs, such as concerts in G. Rollie White."

Walters said Networks is devoted to increasing non-disabled students' awareness and understanding of disability issues.

"Most able-bodied people say 'It may never happen to me,'" Walters said. "In fact, one out of three or four people will have a disability."

chair basketball game, which will be on Thursday, helps raise awareness. The Texas Aggies Rolling Thunder wheelchair basketball team plays against non-disabled students, who also use wheelchairs.

"It's a very physical sport," Harris said. "By the end the participants are very exhausted and impressed with the students who are disabled. It's very awareness raising."

Walters said she suggests students participate in all activities sponsored by Networks and join the organization.

"The majority of our members are people with disabilities," Walters said, "but anyone interested can join. We like to get the non-disabled person's point of view."

"The most important thing is to realize that change is on-going. We just need to recognize that and keep plugging away."

"Simplify, simplify."
