Voting

Olympia is in Thurston County, one of seven Washington counties that for the first time this year conducted the primary entirely by mail.

"There was absolutely no sense of community," said King. He enjoys voting at a polling place, where he can see neighbors, punch his ballot in secret, then drop it with satisfaction into the ballot box.

Voting by mail felt "like paying a bill," he said.

The new age of innovative voting dates at least to 1977, when California ended its requirement that only disabled voters or those who would be away on Election Day could use absentee ballots.

Now any Californian can vote absentee, and in recent years, Republican and Democratic party leaders have made a science of identifying supporters and mailing them absentee ballot applications. In the June primary, absentee ballots made up 20 percent of all votes cast.

At least three other states — Oklahoma, Oregon and Washington — have similar "no-excuse" absentee balloting.

Seven states take the idea a step further. Arizona, California, Colorado, Iowa, Nevada, Tennessee and Texas offer some form of early voting, allowing or encouraging voters to cast "in-person absentee ballots" at polling stations before Election Day.

Since 1991, Texas' most populous counties have provided satellite and mobile voting stations starting 20 days before Election Day.

Bexar County, encompassing San Antonio, has 32 satellite polling stations at retail sites. Five voting vans roam the county, parking at churches, flea markets, senior centers and corporate headquarters.

In the 1992 presidential election, 52.5 percent of all Bexar County votes were cast before Election Day.

But early voting has drawbacks, said Curtis Gans, director of The Committee for the Study of the American Electorate, based in Washington, D.C.

Gans sees problems in early voters basing their decisions on different information from those who wait.
