Kibler said preventive strategies he found through his study include educational programs, communication efforts and training faculty members how to deal with academic integrity.

"Primarily, we need a lot more involvement by faculty members and students," he said. "There hasn't been a study done about how often A&M students cheat and I'd say A&M is typical in that respect, so it is a significant problem. It's possible that as many as two-thirds of A&M students have cheated in one way or another."

Kibler's study reported the most prevalent sanctions used in cases of academic dishonesty are an F in the course, suspension, zero on the test or assignment, probation and a warning or letter in the student's file.

Wilson said he will focus on the task force the rest of the semester.

"The task force may not have a lot of direct impact this year, and that's OK as long as it has an impact in the next few years," he said.

He said his vision for the task force is not only within A&M. "I also want people from A&M to see something being done and see how the average person is," Wilson said. "I want people to hold Aggies ahead of society. I want a corporate reputation when he sits down to talk about that first Aggie, to think of the article he read about A&M concerning the integrity and the morals of the University."
