Bonfire pages. The pages include the latest photo of the stack and a history of the Bonfire.

"University Relations provided a brief history of Bonfire," Ambrose said. "From the Archives in Evans Library, we got a picture of the first Bonfire and the first all-log Bonfire."

The majority of messages received has been positive, but some have been negative, Ambrose said.

"Some negative remarks came from ecology conscience people regarding the smoke and the burning wood," he said. "We've had some negative comments from students at the University of Texas."

He said that some of the comments from Texas students have been cute.

"They thought that it was a neat idea," Ambrose said. "They applauded our efforts. They said that they hope that we pay as much special attention to the score. They also suggested that we focus a camera on the score board, since the game isn't televised."

Sparks came up with the idea after he viewed the "virtual coffee pot" in Cambridge, England. Ambrose said he then thought that Bonfire could be broadcast across the Internet.

"Then I thought, heck, let's show the building of Bonfire," he said. "That gives us more time to publicize and gain more interest."

More interest has been gained and even renewed in Aggie Bonfire.

"We've had former Aggies in Croatia, England, Australia, Seattle, Indiana and from NASA access the pages," Ambrose said. "They said that being away from A&M, they had lost sight of Bonfire. But seeing it again in the Internet renewed their enthusiasm for A&M."

Even with all the enthusiasm, there are not any future plans for the football game to be broadcast in cyberspace, but there are other ideas being discussed.

"The idea has shown to be sound," Sparks said. "There is some speculation for other programs."

He said that there has been talk of putting a camera on the top of the Academic Building. "People could click in and see the weather at A&M," Sparks said.

There are other programs that are in the Internet, Ambrose said. There is access to the electronic phone book and the master calendar, "The Fortnightly." Also, 15 to 20 departments across campus have their own Web servers. The departments then offer information specifically about their own department.
