inspectors stunned by new method of drug smuggling

NEW YORK (AP) — Customs agents have found drugs stuffed into bras and boa constrictors. They've seen them laminated into surfboards and plastic clocks. They've even pulled them out of human stomachs.

Still, they were taken aback by their latest find, 5 pounds of cocaine surgically implanted in the belly of an Old English sheepdog.

"I've seen cases of tropical fish that were force-fed with cocaine and we once found it in a boa constrictor, but I don't call a mammal ever being used to smuggle drugs," said Harry Badaraco, a customs inspector at Kennedy Airport.

Customs spokeswoman Dana Rapaport said the discovery was the first known case of a dog being used to smuggle cocaine through a New York port. There was a case in Miami several years ago involving horses carrying heroin in their anal cavities.

Credit for stopping the cocaine dog went to Customs officer Michael Maloney. He was on overnight duty at JFK on Dec. 6 when he noticed the animal, which had arrived ill and lethargic aboard a flight from Bogota, Colombia, with a strange bulge in its belly.

Veterinarian Steven Weinstein performed emergency surgery and removed 10 balloons, each containing several cocaine-packed condoms.

The drugs, if pure, had a street value of perhaps $250,000, officials said. If one packet had broken it would have killed the dog, Weinstein said.

John Erik Roa, 22, of Paterson, N.J., was arrested when he tried to claim the dog the next day. He was arraigned in federal court Monday on charges of attempting to possess an illegal substance with intent to distribute. He could get up to 40 years in prison.

The bust had government officials talking about the various ways narcotics smugglers use to move their product, from the mundane, like hollowed-out picture frames, to the outrageous, like the bodies and coffins of soldiers killed in Vietnam.

John Dowd, a spokesman for the Drug Enforcement Administration in New York, remembered how an African once arrived in JFK with a suitcase containing three large motor oil cans, explaining he had come to "change the oil in the embassy car." When a Customs agent drilled the can, he found marijuana.

Another traveler, arriving from Colombia with a cocaine-filled bowling ball, was tripped up by an inspector who "didn't think they had bowling alleys in Bogota."

"I don't think they'll ever run out of ideas — it's almost a slight of hand, getting a person to look the other way while you're doing something off," Dowd said.
