'94-95 CAMPUS DIRECTORY
My love for writing for the people at Texas A&M. In my columns, I have been able to entertain, inform, and share some really personal feelings with the student body and faculty of this school. No one really ever thought you could do all that with a sports column. With my stories, I have been able to report on countless sporting events and sports figures. My passions have endured some changes, however, and whether you care or not, I'd like to inform you that I will not be writing for the sports page next semester. It's not that I don't like sports anymore. Not that at all! I just need a change of pace. I still love to write, and you'll just have to pick up the first couple of issues of The Battalion next semester to locate me at my new address. I'd tell you where it is, but I haven't been hired to write there yet, and I don't want to jinx myself.

Georgandis

When I handed in the first draft to my editor, I was apprehensive as to what he was going to say. At the same time, however, I was feeling somewhat sure of myself...

About three days later, the first issue of The Battalion came out. Anxiously I searched for my gem. After leafing through the football preview section, I found it. As I sat in the Commons reading my story, the expression on my face changed from happiness to astonishment to anger. That wasn't my story. That was my editor's story with my byline. Feeling like a failure, I contemplated my future as a sportswriter.

Should I quit? They wouldn't even miss me if I did. Fumbling through my jumbled list of phone numbers, I called the man who would soon become my best friend at The Battalion, Nick Georgandis.

Georgandis and I were in the same boat at The Batt. He too was a young and naive beginner. He too had been All-World at his high school paper. He too realized that The Batt was much different from his high school paper. He too saw his byline that day on a story that he clearly did not write.

Georgandis came over. (He lived in Aston and I lived in Dunn). We bitched and sulked about our Battalion debuts over a couple of games of John Madden Football. Reeling from the disgust I felt after reading The Battalion that morning, and reeling from the disgust I felt after eating an entire Gummy's pizza that afternoon, I decided to call The Battalion and give the sports editors a piece of my mind...

When William Harrison, one of the two sports editors, answered the phone, I thought about lighting into him like Buddy Ryan into Kevin Gilbride. But I didn't. My better judgment caught up with me, and I merely asked him
