Snake-catching inmate accuses prison guards of misconduct

DILLEY, (AP) — A state inmate claims prison guards ordered him to catch and kill hundreds of rattlesnakes using only his hands and a hoe.
 The prisoner, Tim Volk, who is serving 12 years for armed robbery, said he got bitten by one of the snakes, which led to his being passed over for early release.
 Now Volk is suing prison officials in federal court in San Antonio.

Volk was quoted as saying in Monday's San Antonio Express-News that he caught and killed rattlesnakes during his two stints as a field trusty between 1992 and 1994.

"At first, you don't mind. It's kind of a novelty, but it got very tiring very quick," said Volk, 35.
 He said he killed the snakes and turned over the valuable hides to the guards.

Volk said he complained, but to no avail.
 In a civil rights lawsuit filed last month, Volk claims he was bitten on Sept. 14, 1994, when guard Robert McHazzlett told him to remove a small snake from the work area.

Volk said he saw two inmates in the hoe squad fighting. As he tried to toss the rattlesnake away, "a single fang caught me on the finger," he said.

He was taken to a Pearsall hospital, then was airlifted to University Hospital in San Antonio.

Back at prison, Volk said he was soon written up for three major infractions: possession of narcotics, violation of safety rules and disobeying an order in handling the snake.

Volk lost on all three counts. He said the write-ups kept him from getting early release and cost him another year in prison.

He is asking the judge to declare the working conditions at the Briscoe Unit unconstitutional and to ban any work, including the handling of dangerous snakes, that jeopardizes inmates' health and safety.
