Chemical fumes engulf Japan subway system, breed concern

□ Nerve gas planted on a Tokyo subway kills eight and sickens more than 3,200 citizens. The attack draws attention to what was once considered one of the world's safer countries.

TOKYO (AP) — Police in protective gear seized five packages of nerve gas that spread death Monday through Tokyo's crowded subway system, hunting for clues in a chilling new chapter in urban terrorism: the use of chemical weapons.

No one claimed responsibility for the chilling attack, which killed eight people, sickened more than 3,200 others and paralyzed one of the world's busiest subway systems.

It stunned the Japanese, who consider their country among the world's safest.

The attack drew new attention to earlier, unsolved cases of chemical poisoning, including the deaths of seven people in the central Japanese city of Matsumoto in June.

As in the subway attack, authorities blamed sarin, a nerve gas developed by the Nazis in World War II.

The threat of chemical or biological terrorism has worried governments increasingly in recent years, as the technology became more widespread and easy to obtain.

"Terrorists have taken that step across the threshold into the use of weapons of mass destruction," said Kyle Olson of the Chemical and Biological Arms Control Institute in Alexandria, Va.

Olson studied the Matsumoto poisoning and warned in February that it could happen again.

"I began to reach the conclusion that this was a dress rehearsal of some type, that someone was trying to get the hang of using a new weapon," he told Associated Press Television on Monday.

Police refused to discuss suspects Monday and the motive for the attack was unclear.

The Aum Shinri Kyo religious cult, previously accused of making sarin, denied any involvement and threatened to sue anyone who suggested there was a link.

The planners likely had advanced knowledge of chemistry. While it is fairly easy to obtain the ingredients to produce sarin, the chemical process is difficult to perform.

A little as a drop of sarin — inhaled or on the skin — can kill a person almost instantly.

The gas attacks a key enzyme over central Tokyo fainted, vomited or went into convulsions as the fumes spread. Six people died and more than 3,200 received medical treatment.

Akio Masahata, 21, said he was on his way to work when his train stopped, and an announcement said there had been an explosion.

"Then I started to smell it," he said, sitting on a gurney at St. Luke's International Hospital. "It hurt to breathe. I could feel it in my nostrils. When I realized it must be gas, people were starting to collapse around me."

Police removed packages leaking sarin from four subway stations — the Kasumigaseki station which serves the government hub of Tokyo, Tsukiji station near Tokyo's largest fish market, the Hongo-sanchome station and Nakano-sakaue.

But passengers straggled or were carried from stations at stops throughout a wide section of central Tokyo.

The poisoned trains ran on lines that travelled near the Ginza shopping district and the Hiroo and Roppongi districts where many foreigners live.

Japan is no stranger to urban violence. But in the past, there have always been specific targets.

Right-wing radicals have attacked newspapers that criticized the imperial family or politicians who offered apologies for Japan's wartime actions.

The attack Monday was a new blow to the self-confidence of a nation that is only now emerging from severe recession.

"I can't imagine how anyone could do something like this," said Masahisa Machida, a 37-year-old office worker who rides the subway regularly. "This is a civilized country — we have no room for terrorism."
