'Good time' under review by prison board

Prisoners to see cutbacks on credit system designed to shorten time served.

HUNTSVILLE (AP) — The so-called "good time" credits given to Texas prison inmates are coming under the scrutiny of the Texas Board of Criminal Justice, whose new chairman is committed to stiffening credits that have allowed convicts to get out of prison early.

"That's extremely important in restoring confidence and integrity in the criminal justice system in the state," Chairman Allan Polunsky said.

The board takes up the question of good time at its regular meeting, set for Friday in Austin.

"I'm committed to the continuation of the reformation of good time policies," Polunsky said. "And certainly that was one of Gov. Bush's platform planks in his election."

"I'm strongly committed to initiating the changes, or effectuating the changes, that need to be made to tighten up good time."

Prisoners now entering the system accrue 40 days of good time for 30 days actually served.

Polunsky says that makes no sense. If good time is continued, it should be at a much lower rate, he says.

The combination of good time and actual time served, known as flat time, can speed up an inmate's release date.

In addition, he wants to stop restoring previously earned good-time credits to inmates returned to the corrections system as parole violators. And he says accumulation of good time must be extended if an inmate violates prison rules.

The changes are the result of a billion-dollar prison expansion program that added more than 100,000 beds over the past five years, allowing incarceration of more convicts and more violent and repeat offenders.

The board meeting, which began Thursday with subcommittee sessions, is the first full board meeting with Polunsky as chairman. The San Antonio real estate lawyer was named by Bush earlier this month to replace Democrat Carol Vance, an Ann Richards appointee.

Polunsky already had been on the board, named more than seven years ago by then-Gov. Bill Clements, a Republican. He is the only Republican on the panel.
