

By Alvaro Judge Ito deals with jury problems

LOS ANGELES (AP) — The rebellious jurors in the O.J. Simpson case are doing more talking than listening these days.

Usually, juries sit quietly and listen. To the judge. To the lawyers. To the witnesses.

This trial is different. A tumultuous week ended Friday with 13 of the sequestered panelists demanding that Superior Court Judge Lance Ito meet them at their hotel. When they finally agreed to go to court, many dressed in black to protest the dismissal of three of their guards.

"This conduct is bizarre," veteran defense lawyer Barry Tarlow said. "It's virtually unprecedented and destructive of the jury system, and in some sense a result of what happens when you put 24 strangers in jail together for 100 days."

Monday, they were to talk with the judge and lawyers. Again. One dismissed panelist has talked of racial strife and personality conflicts within the group, along with problems with the deputies guarding them. Also to be questioned Monday were three deputies, said Assistant Sheriff Michael Graham, whose department handles court security and guards jurors.

The troubles of the 18 jurors and alternates have overshadowed the business at hand: deciding whether Simpson murdered his ex-wife Nicole Brown Simpson and her friend Ronald Goldman on June 12, 1994.

Ito delayed this week's testimony until Tuesday, when criminalist Andrea Mazzola is scheduled to retake the stand for further cross-examination.

Last week, Ito halted testimony for part of Tuesday and all of Wednesday so he could talk to jurors one-on-one, then said he found no misconduct.
