Career: Center links students with jobs

students can access job openings and on-campus interviews. Alumni registered with the center can access job openings and interviews by telephone through the job line.

Katie Nichols, senior industrial distribution major, said that nearly all the students in her major find a job through the career center. "The convenience, stress and redundancy it alleviates puts you a step ahead when looking for a job," she said.

Companies conducting interviews on campus between now and May 2 include Hewlett Packard, Plantation Foods, Inc. and Office Depot. Ziola Humphrey, employment office assistant with Plantation Foods, Inc., said Plantation Foods is looking for A&M student production supervisory positions.

"We have a relationship with A&M in hiring tons and tons of A&M students in the past," Humphrey said. "Because of the excellent agriculture department at A&M, graduates from this department make good supervisory candidates."

Job postings are available for all students, even those not interested with the career center.

Payne said these postings are from companies that will not come to campus to conduct interviews, but expect students to come to them. Nearly 500 full-time jobs and internships have been run through the job-posting list this year, Payne said.

Evaluations: Students can view results fill out the survey on the teacher evaluations so we can find out what they need."

Mark Troy, coordinator for evaluations programs in Measurement and Research Services, said student ratings of faculty will be a helpful tool for students.

"As students become aware of the availability of the teacher evaluations, it will be as useful as grade distributions for them," he said. "The more aware students are of the results of the evaluations, the better it will be for everyone."

Troy said making teacher evaluations available to students may improve how they complete the evaluations.

"I hope students will take the evaluations more seriously when their input goes somewhere and people are looking at them," he said.

Shopp agreed that making student ratings of faculty accessible to students could help obtain higher quality responses.

"Right now a lot of students simply bubble in anything," he said. "I hope that those who are apathetic toward evaluations will be more serious when they see other students are using them."

Shopp said providing students with teacher evaluations could help improve overall quality of education students receive.

"There has been some resistance to making these documents available to students," he said. "We hope this helps those professors who are leery of being rated want to do their best for their students."

Student ratings of faculty have been available on computer for about two months. Students with GOPHER can access teacher evaluations through their personal computers.
