Clinton: Democrats, GOP swap challenges

suggest that Republicans want to raid Medicare to finance tax cuts rather than improve the program's financial standing.

"I believe it is wrong simply to slash Medicare and Medicaid to pay for tax cuts for people who are well off," the president declared to loud applause. "We must have a sense of what our obligations are."

Clinton is challenging Republicans to put out their fiscal 1996 budget proposal and specify how they would achieve their stated goal of saving $250 billion to $300 billion in projected Medicare spending over seven years.

Some of the GOP changes would be designed to persuade people to move into forms of care other than the traditional fee-for-service program on which most Medicare recipients now rely.

At a White House briefing, Donna Shalala, the secretary of health and human services, said the GOP reductions could result in a seven-year increase of $3,100 to $3,700 in out-of-pocket costs for beneficiaries.

Without directly pointing at Republicans, Clinton told the seniors he would fight any effort to "trade the long-term welfare and health of the American people for anybody's short-term gain."

Gingrich called the president's address "enormously disappointing," and accused him of "exploiting senior citizens for the narrowest of political purposes."

The sparring between Capitol Hill and the White House continued unabated as House Republicans embarked on a three-day private retreat in nearby Leesburg, Va., with Medicare high on the agenda.

Clinton, for his part, sought to project an activist image in announcing a program to crack down on Medicaid and Medicare fraud, particularly in the areas of home health agencies, nursing homes and suppliers of durable medical equipment.

"These initiatives are the right way to control health-care costs and protect Medicare for our senior citizens," Clinton said.
