last name," he said. "Basically, it's just a unique identifier." The software for Electronic Phonebook was written at the University of Illinois and made available to A&M students three years ago.

Students can access Electronic Phonebook through Gopher and the World Wide Web. "Gopher is a simple menu driven system," Fleitman said. "You just choose a menu item and get more menu items. The World Wide Web is a way to get information on the Internet through a direct address or a hypertext link." Fleitman said to use a hypertext link a student can just click on a word and it will go to a different document. He said if a student has a Vax, Unix or Virtual Machine (VM) account, then the student types in "gopher." If a student is using Windows in a computer lab on campus, then the student should go to the communications group and click on the gopher or web icon, he said. Dr. John McClain, senior systems analyst for the Academic Computing Service, offered advice for students about Electronic Phonebook.

"People across the world can locate information about students at A&M through the Electronic Phonebook, and because of this it is very helpful if students list their e-mail address in this phonebook," McClain said. The Electronic TAMU Community Calendar is another service CIS provides to students. "This calendar lists meetings, conferences, ceremonies and holidays," Fleitman said. "Students and departments can add an event or delete an event if it is canceled." The electronic calendar began about a year ago after University Relations stopped producing a University-wide calendar, Fleitman said. A&M students can access the calendar through the World Wide Web and Gopher. Fleitman said student and University department input is necessary for the calendar to be successful.
