WOMEN: Female cadets not given special treatment

been concerns of Faulkner's critics. Faulkner was 20 pounds overweight, and critics claimed her physical condition impeded her success at the Citadel.

"I am very disappointed in the way she prepared for it (the Citadel), because there is no way she could have made it in the shape she was in," Rimmer said. "You have to prepare your body along with your mind."

"If you are not physically fit, you'll crack under the stress."

Cindy Erickson, Corps public relations and recruiting sergeant and a junior political science major, said that women in the Corps are expected to fulfill the same requirements as the men.

Female cadets are not given any special treatment since the primary focus for the freshman year in the Corps is unification, she said.

"You all do your push-ups together, you go to football games together, you go to yell practice together," Erickson said. "Because if you treat females differently, then you would isolate them."

Maj. Becky Ray, special assistant to the commandant and adviser on gender issues, said women can learn about the Corps before joining to ensure they would enjoy being cadets.

Spend the Night with the Corps is a program that gives interested high school students the opportunity to stay with a Corps member and attend classes with the cadets.

"I think the program is by far the best answer for learning about the Corps," Ray said. "This way students actually see and experience the Corps."

Women have been making their marks at previous male-dominated military institutes recently. Rebecca Marier beat out 988 other cadets in 1995 to graduate first in her class at Point.

Erickson said that women will play an important role in the future as more women join the armed forces. This indicates that there will be more Shannon Faulkner's in the future, she said.

"As long as there are women who want to go there and risk their lives along with their fellow soldiers, then women will be serving the military," she said. "I think the program is by far the best answer for learning about the Corps," Ray
