Nevertheless, Tippett said he was surprised to win twice in a row.

"The second time, even more, because I knew how stiff competition is," he said.

Segrest said that when he entered OCS, he was focused on graduating and performing to his potential.

"One of my goals was not to fo-cus on awards," he said. "I wasn't looking for them or expecting them. I just did my best. If they want to give me awards for doing my best, that's fine with me." Segrest credited God for his awards.

"The glory goes to God in this and not to me," he said. "He kept me healthy there and helped me perform better than I could have on my own."

Maj. Gen. Thomas Darling, Corps commandant, said he re ceives positive feedback every year about the performance of A&M students at various summer military programs.

"It speaks well of the Corps' programs," Darling said. "It makes me very proud." Darling said he is especially impressed with Segrest's determination.

"The fact that Matt Segrest just cleaned up on all those awards is something special," he said. "That's quite a significant achievement. When he commits himself to something, I have learned to expect great results."

OCS graduates are commissioned into the Marines as second lieutenants upon college graduation.

Segrest said he hopes to specialize in ground intelligence, and Tippett said he wants to serve in the infantry.
