Antique English etchings and modern formulation bring variety to MSC galleries

The art exhibit, "Joseph Albers' Formulation Articulation" and etchings by William Hogarth are on play in the J. Wayne Stark Galleries in the MSC until Oct. 10.

By Brad Russell
THE BATTALION

When picturing old London in the 17th and 18th century, many envision the London of Shakespeare — a society of aristocracy, royalty, and nobility.

However, William Hogarth's vision of his home was quite different. This vision is portrayed in 99 etchings which depict middle- and lower-class London as seen through Hogarth's eyes.

The collection, on loan from the Sarah Campbell Blaffer Foundation of Houston, is being presented in the J. Wayne Stark Galleries in the MSC until Oct. 10.

Hogarth, who was born in 1697 in England, spent his early years in a debtor's prison. Hogarth trained as an apprentice with a London silver engraver and eventually sold and auctioned his own works.

Dr. James Clifton, director of the Blaffer Foundation, said Hogarth's etchings and paintings are typically very straight-forward and easily understood by the observer.

"They typically can be read like a story," Dr. Clifton said.

Hogarth, who had strong anti-French sentiments, used the French as the subjects of many of his etchings and paintings. Hogarth's feelings could be attributed to his fear of the French constantly trying to import their culture into England. Throughout his works, the French are depicted as emaciated and poor, and Hogarth uses these images to create feelings toward the French that mirror his own.

Catherine Hastedt, registrar and curator of the Stark Gallery, said that Hogarth had a particular dislike for art dealers, who were subjects of his works.

"He saw art dealers as people who brought standard art over to England from Europe and sold them to unsuspecting Englishmen as masterpieces," Hastedt said.

The focus of the majority of the etchings is satire and moral narrative. His works are highly topical. Hogarth etched on numerous different subjects, including London, politics, and what he called progressors, or a series of etchings that depict a related storyline.

For example, Hogarth's "Harlot's Progress" series of etchings that depicts an English woman just arriving into the city, only to meet the madam. As the progress begins to focus on her life, the once innocent woman is seen in less attractive surroundings and accompanied by men who are clearly of a lower social class than whom she previously associated with.

In addition to etchings, Hogarth also received recognition for his works in novels, most notably the English version of Don Quixote.

During his life, Hogarth was immensely popular, and Clifton said he was an extremely influential artist.

"Hogarth was one of the two most important artists of the 18th century, the other being J.M.W. Reynolds," Clifton said. "He had the ability to reach the human condition."

In a brochure available at the exhibit, art critic Sean Shesgreen said his work was well-received by all.

"Hogarth's work is delightful and instructive in ways in which his commentators can never adequately explicate and which time can only enhance," he said.
