Why Sports?

Dennis Corrington

My philosophy is that each individual needs to establish a balanced lifestyle. I really believe in the wellness concept. From my point of view, sports and recreation make you productive in all other phases of life.

We are fortunate that, as an educational institution, Texas A&M also values learning experiences that occur outside the classroom. Sports offers personal development and leadership training through competitive play and officiating. In addition, outdoor recreation teaches respect for nature.

As Director of the Department of Recreational Sports, I want to create a wide variety of activities that will appeal to the various students here at Texas A&M. What fits one person might not fit the other. Our intramural and sports club programs provide an outlet for the competitive spirit that so many students arrive at Texas A&M with, while teaching cooperation.

Rec Sports is not only about athletics. Our purpose is to create a spot for recreation and play in everyone's life. With our fitness and outdoor adventure programs, we can help students find an interest in recreation and play. With the new Rec Center, we have many opportunities for drop in recreation and relaxation.

This new facility has resulted in a significant change in culture for the university. We now see over 5000 people a day involved in recreation compared to 700 previously. We are committed to offer the best quality of facilities and programs for the best student body in the country.

Students tackle excitement with intramurals

The beginning of a new school year opens another exciting season of one of the biggest intramural programs in the country. Texas A&M currently plans for over 62 intramural events throughout the year.

The Department of Recreational Sports is the home of A&M's intramurals program.

"We provide sports for everyone, officials and players, and we are always open to new sports," Intramurals Director, James Welford said.

Students compete in classes suited to their skill and ability. Classes of competition range from A--highly competitive to D--fun and recreation. Additionally, there are events for men, women and co-recreational participants. Intramurals are not only open to students. Faculty, staff, their spouses and adult dependants can also play.

Participants are encouraged to play in as many intramural events as possible. The Department of Recreational Sports schedules intramural events all year, so there are many opportunities to play different sports. In fact, many students feel that playing intramural sports is the most affordable entertainment in college.

"Intramurals are an inexpensive way to have fun socially, yet they are still very competitive activities," intramural participant, Mark Mannes said. "Intramurals serve as an outlet from the basic college routine and keep you physically fit. It helps feed my competitive nature."

Intramural participant D. D. Adamcik noted that Bryan/College Station's limited night-life keeps her playing intramurals.

"I really don't like to dance and the thing to do around here is dancing," Adamcik said. "I'd rather play athletics!"

For those interested in an exciting night life, new friends, a competitive edge or even a job officiating, look to the intramurals program located right here on campus.

For information about upcoming intramural games, call 845-7826 or visit the intramurals desk at the Student Recreation Center.

SPORT CLUBS

A Competitive Edge

At the crack of dawn every weekend, a special group of Aggies pull themselves out of bed, stuff their duffel bags, fill their water bottles, and proudly drape themselves with the dark maroon logo of Texas A&M. All of this is done in preparation for their venture into the fierce, teeth grinding inter-collegiate competition of Sports Clubs.

These teams are recognized student organizations that are selectively administered by the Department of Recreational Sports. Currently, thirty-one sport clubs exist at Texas A&M, ranging from ultimate frisbee and lacrosse to polo and sailing.

"There are lots of sports that we have that I would consider non-traditional sports in Texas," Sport Club Director Paula Opal said.

Clubs are funded in part by the university, sponsorships, dues, alumni, and fund-raisers. Members say that without the club, weekly or monthly competition would be absolutely impossible because of costs.

Sport Clubs encourage beginners in their clubs. In fact, many students who are unfamiliar with a certain sport learn to play through weekly practice and helpful sport club veterans.

"Rugby is very social," rugby member Mitch Bullock said. "It doesn't matter how old, fast or who you are because everyone is always welcome to be a part of the club."

With Sport Clubs, students quickly find recreation, competition, close friends, and unforgettable experiences.

Some Sport Clubs are not competitively oriented. The weightlifting club offers hard rock music and a private workout studio to students, faculty and staff interested in body building.

Many Sport Club members praise the benefits of joining a club. Members say that clubs improve their diet, sleep, and concentration for classes.

"I have gotten myself in great shape," Bullock said. "I learned to work with other people."

Sports Clubs are truly an alternative to informal backyard sports. All you need is the motivation to learn and the dedication to practice. If you have the desire, A&M has the sport. For current Sports Club information please call 845-7826 or 845-3076.
