Finally, it's Hakeem vs. Shaq

SPORTSWRITER

The big game is finally here. The game that will settle the question — once and for all — that has been plaguing sports fans for some time now — the question of who really is the best.

Tomorrow on television, we'll finally get to witness the showdown, well, for a small fee of $19.95, that is, it's on pay-per-view, and it's not boxing, it's basketball.

It all started after the NBA Finals ...

We've seen the newspaper ad, we've seen the commercials and now we'll get to see Hakeem "The Dream" Olajuwon and Shaquille O'Neal finally go head-to-head, one-on-one, to settle once and for all who the better player is.

Live from Trump's Taj Majal in Las Vegas, the Houston Rocket's own Hakeem will take on Orlando's Shaq.

Not only will these two go head-to-head, but Kenny Anderson of the New Jersey Nets and Nick Van Exel of the Los Angeles Lakers will also face off.

In what will be the battle of the rookies, Joe Smith, from the Golden State Warriors, will take on Kevin Garnett of the Minnesota Timberwolves.

The players agreed to these face-offs in the midst of the NBA labor strike, and now that the strike is over, there is nothing to be done to stop them.

Some are looking at these games as friendly competition.

What's the harm? It's simply a game of one-on-one ball involving two rivals from oppoteams. Others see it as a risky advertising ploy that could prodize the professional careers of the players. What would come of Smith and Garnett, one of them happened to suffer a serious injury? There go the NBA contracts.

I say let them play. There's nothing wrong with competition.

It'll give us a chance to see which players can stand alone without their teammates to back them up. It will give these players the opportunity to prove something to themselves and the teams they represent.

So what if the players are doing this only because Taco Bell is paying them.

Does it really matter who wins? Well no, but it is still an opportunity for basketball to see some good ball in the season.
