as did previous generations of students," he said.

Large and small A&M colleges felt the positive impact of the Capturing the Spirit Campaign.

Eileen Kuvlesky, College of Medicine development director, said the campaign will benefit her college greatly in several ways.

"The money was earmarked for specific things," Kuvlesky said. "One of our major gifts was an endowed deanship."

Kuvlesky said students will also see some of the money in the form of scholarships.

"We were able to funnel some new money into scholarships which we needed desperately," she said. "We actually did pretty well for a college our size and our age, and I feel it was a success for us."

Jennifer Abraham, College of Liberal Arts development director, said the college's funds from the campaign will finance student scholarships, research fellowships and graduate assistantships.

"It has been a tremendous help," Abraham said. "The campaign, more than anything else, has created an atmosphere for giving at Texas A&M."

Larger colleges had the benefit of greater numbers of former students to donate money for assistance.

Mark Klemm, College of Engineering assistant director of development, said engineering surpassed its individual college goal of $65 million because of the generosity of its former students.

"Almost a fourth of all the students that are out there are former engineering majors," Klemm said.

"The gifts we have got from people are going to be scholarships, professorships, equipment gift," he said.

Klemm said the Capturing the Spirit Campaign increased the awareness of the University's needs among the former students, corporations and other potential donors.

"It helps point out the need [of the University]," he said, "and even though we're close to the conclusion of this campaign it's still pointing out additional needs that the University has as a whole."
