Where music and literature meet

Chamber Concert Series provides a glimpse of early Paris

By Katharine Deaton
THE BATTALION

Music and literature will merge in Marcel Proust's Paris, the second concert of the University Chamber Concert series, tonight at 7:30 in Rudder Theater.

"It is going to cover the turn-of-the-century Paris in a typical salon setting in which writers and musicians shared their talents," Werner Rose, a professor of music, said.

The concert is "interdisciplinary," Rose said. Music by composers from early Paris is incorporated with Proust's literary works to highlight his masterpiece, Remembrance of Things Past.

"It pulls in literature, music, imagery and philosophy and shows that all these fields interact with the human experience," Rose said.

Performing in the concert are violinist Laurie Smukler, pianist Sarah Rothenberg, cellist Carter Brey, tenor John Aler and violist Hsin-Yun Huang. The narration will be provided by Pulitzer Prize-winning poet Richard Howard.

"We're very enthusiastic that we have such fine performers on this program," Rose said.

Rose said the performers, in addition to its interdisciplinary characteristic, make the concert unique.

"It's not the kind of program you see every day," he said. "It's coordinated and structured through its chosen topic."

Rose said the soloists and narrators in Paris is make the program unique.

"The University Chamber Concert series is a series of programs that present music written for soloists or small ensembles," Rose said. "It's intended to be heard in a more intimate setting of a small room. OPAS brings in big events which are meant to be heard in the auditorium, but they don't bring in soloists and ensembles because they are meant to be heard in a small hall. We try to fill in the gap. We try to complement what OPAS does."

Rose said students will benefit from the exposure to Proust's literature.

"It's a marvelous opportunity," he said. "[Students] are going to be introduced to a major work and perhaps their appetites [for literature] will be whetted."

Rose said Paris will educate students in the thinking and culture of turn-of-the-century people.

"If you really want to learn about a particular time in history, look at what they wrote, and listen to their music," Rose said.

The concert will be performed in only two other cities, Houston and New York.

Sarah Rothenberg is playing piano tonight's concert.

"This will be the first time it is performed," Rose said. "We're very fortunate to have this program at A&M. It will be a very powerful program. I think the message will be moving. People will be away with a distinct feeling and flavor of not only the time, but the unique and sound of the turn-of-the-century Paris."
