reach their full potential in telecommunications, Ansboury said funding for rural public services is an issue.

"In the last two years we have seen the Internet explode and become a vehicle for delivery of content over the telecommunications infrastructure," he said.

For infrastructure basic service in every Texas school through 12th, the cost of one computer in every classroom would be $1.5 billion.

To develop funding for public services, the bill created a Telecommunications Funding Board to collect a $1.5 billion award to public services.

Along with money, the board will also provide material and curriculum for schools and universities.

"If you do not have curriculum and knowledge of the equipment it just sits idle."

— Mark Ansboury
manager of the Texas Telecommunications Division

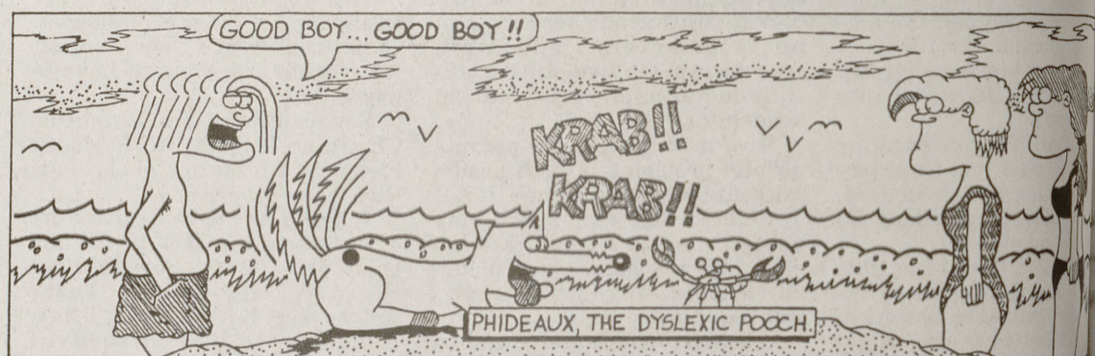

"If you do not have curriculum and knowledge of the equipment it just sits idle," Ansboury said. "I have seen schools purchase telecommunications material just for the sake of spending money on hardware and not ever use it."

Ansboury said that because of the shortage of funds and fast pace technology, he has seen more government at the city and federal level team up fund telecommunications. "When collaboration between government schools occur more information is given to more people a lower cost," Brown said. Ansboury said should not become compatible with today's telecommunications because it is a dynamic and what we are interested today will be tomorrow.
