Boenig focuses on student needs

By Amy Protas
THE BATTALION

Toby Boenig starts his day at 8 a.m. and ends it at 11 p.m. He is the Texas A&M student body president, voice of over 41,000 students.

Toby Boenig

Boenig graduated with 54 seniors from Marion High School, a high school 10 miles south of New Braunfels.

Boenig said moving from a big town was not as hard as expected. "I thought it would be a big deal at first," he said. "But when I got here, it wasn't such a big deal. College Station has a small-town atmosphere."

After being extremely involved in extracurricular activities in high school, Boenig decided to take a break once he got to college.

"I made a pledge with a friend not to get involved when I got to A&M," Boenig said. "We were going to concentrate on grades and be normal people. That lasted for a semester."

When a friend told Boenig about an open Student Senate seat, he got pulled back into extracurricular activities.

Boenig said student government was a way to help others.

"I get to meet so many people," Boenig said. "There are a lot of late nights, but I know I'm trying to do good for others. Knowing that is what keeps me going."

Although being student body president has its advantages, it also has its drawbacks.

Boenig said he does not get to spend much time with his friends. He also said he has to face criticism.

"Getting criticized is good, but you also wonder about it," Boenig said. "You have to get thick-skinned. I've learned to do that."

Boenig started his term last semester with a platform aimed at obtaining what students need.

mester with a platform aimed at obtaining what students need.

"One of the things I created was a vice president for finance," Boenig said. "Because we had so many new fees last year, we wanted to place a lot of attention on that area."

The Fee Oversight Committee researches all new fees and increases. It uses this research to find out if the fees are justified.

Boenig said his administration has brought improvements in the library.

"The library drastically needed to be improved," Boenig said. "Last year, the fee was passed that has brought in $2.3 million this year. We're going to suggest a committee so students will be able to see where funds are going."

Boenig said that until a new student body president is elected in March, he is going to work his hardest to achieve the rest of his platform goals.

"I'm going to put everything I have into these last two months," he said. "I'll have plenty of time to relax after it's over."

One of Boenig's goals is to push for a child-care center provided for faculty members' and students' children.

Eliminating exams during Muster is another of Boenig's goals this semester.

"A year ago, I saw finals that were scheduled during Muster," he said. "At least 1,000 students couldn't go. Every student should be able to go. It is a celebration of life and A&M."

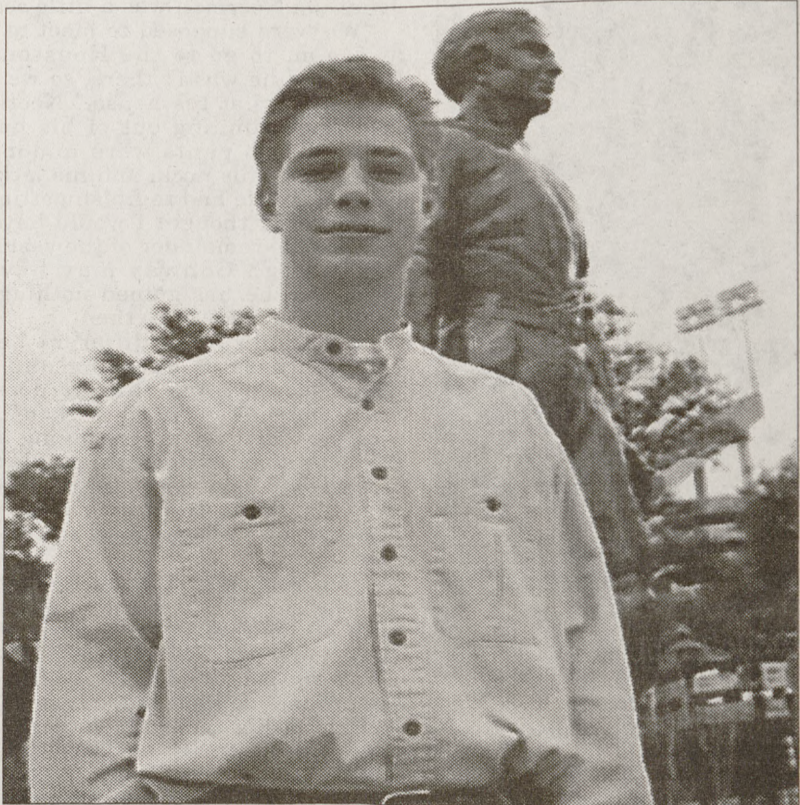

Boenig said students should get involved in order to develop leadership skills.

"Getting involved gives you a voice in the administration on behalf of the students," Boenig said.

"Our administration takes strong value in what we do. Dr. Bowen has to make tough decisions; he really cares. Dr. Southerland even gives out his phone number."

Boenig said even though he respects the administration, he is not afraid to go against them.

"Sometimes you have to agree to disagree," Boenig said. "Whenever we're talking about different issues, I'll disagree, but they respect it. They are public servants, and they should be questioned."

Toby Boenig is the student body president.
