Evan Zimmermann, THE BATTALION

A TURTLE'S TALE

Pepita, a 6-year-old female Kemp's Ridley sea turtle has been at Texas A&M since 1990. She was part of the Head Start program to hatch sea turtle eggs and release them, but she has a spinal deformity that will not allow her to be released. Kemp's Ridley are from the Gulf of Mexico and are the most endangered sea turtles. They are also the smallest sea turtle averaging 100 pounds. Pepita weighs 35 pounds and lives in the Bio Aquatic Facility of the biology department.

Building

He also said it is not feasible at this time to tear down Heaton Hall.

"In order to raze the building, we would have to plan a replacement," he said, "and right now there is no building being planned."

Though Heaton Hall's problems are not as severe as those of other campus buildings, such as the English Annex with its multiple masonry fractures, Dowling said he would like to see it torn down in the next five to seven years.

"I'm not trying to minimize (the problems)," he said, "but Heaton is not in the same category as Law, Puryear and DeWare."

DeWare Field House and Law and Puryear Halls are closed and will be torn down, possibly as early as this summer.

Dowling said the steel structures in these buildings are bowed and rust is eating away at main support beams.

"DeWare, whether we tear it down or not, is coming down," he said.

"It's falling down."

Dowling said the buildings have not been condemned or rendered unsafe, but renovations would be too costly to justify.

Day Care

she is also concerned about the effect other departments in the Grenada Building, including the University Police Department and the Radiological Safety Office, will have on the children. Collie said she worries that the amount of radiation needed to operate the radiological office could be hazardous.

"As a mother," she said, "I am not willing to take a risk like that with my child."

Miller said there is no cause for worry because measures are being taken to relocate radiological laboratories and their waste depositories.

"I have been very open concerning the information on radiological safety," she said.

"We do not want the children in the same building with radiological materials, and we are working on finding an alternative location away from the site of the child care facility for them to do all of their lab work."

Miller said the Radiological Safety Office and UPD headquarters would each have their own entrances, separate from the main entrance to the child-care center.

The children, she said, would not come in contact with employees of either agency.

Collie said she is also worried about "sick-building syndrome," caused when fumes from paints, sealers, new furniture and new carpet emit fumes hazardous in rooms that are not properly ventilated.

Collie suggested that the advisory committee check the ventilation in the Grenada Building before opening the center.

At the meeting, Moore said she and other students on the advisory committee felt they were not being heard by the committee and were being silenced by Miller.

She said Miller had told her and other members of the committee to keep quiet to the media.

Miller said she had not meant to silence students on the committee, but she had asked the committee to refer members of the press to her for the factual information.

"I encourage all students both in and outside of the committee to share their opinions on what is being done, and I really appreciate all of the concerns that students bring forth," she said. "I just encourage them to come to me for the facts about their concerns before they take them to someone else."

"As for the students on the committee, they are the voice of the students as far as the child-care committee is concerned. I think they should share with the world what we are doing, and I encourage them to gather input from the students on campus and share it with the rest of the committee."

The child-care center advisory committee is in the process of evaluating surveys from prospective center users about their needs and concerns. Subcommittees are also working to outline a job description for the center's director and are designing a program for the center's activities and curriculum.
