by African-American students, and a black history quiz show. Kevin Carreathers, director of Multicultural Services, said the week is a fitting way to pay tribute to Broadus.

he had on us," he said. "He was an integral part of everything we do." Washington said Broadus' activities, which ranged from continuous involvement in Alpha Phi Alpha to participation in Aggie Buddies, a program in that he wanted to help — minority individuals who had potential but not the guidance they needed.

Broadus was a recipient of the Buck Weirus Spirit Award. He was also the co-founder of Prime Time Posse, a group that performs skits to high school students to encourage them to do well in school.

Carreathers said he hopes students will be able to gain from Explosion Week the same spirit Broadus had for his community.

"I hope people really take time to reflect back upon the life of Reginald and the contributions he was trying to make here at Texas A&M and to society," he said. "The week serves as a remembrance to students who participate in the activities of what life is really about, and what things they should be doing."

"Reginald was symbolic of all good in life."

"We want to uplift Reginald's name so people don't forget what kind of an impact he had on us."

— STEVEN TRAYLOR
president, Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity

"The week encompasses the many facets of the life of Reginald," he said.

Traylor said he hopes the week's activities will open students' eyes to issues on campus and help them to better understand Broadus' role in them.

"We want to uplift Reginald's name so people don't forget what kind of an impact which he worked with elementary school children, were directed at improving his community and the people in it.

The two men arrested and convicted of his murder were 20 and 15 years old at the time.

"It's ironic because the very things that took his life were the things he dedicated his life to improving," he said. "These were the type of individuals
