Tunnels set change soon

HOUSTON (AP) — Houston will be above such a tree-shaded sunken garden.

The garden and new pedestrian tunnels are among the options coming soon to Houston downtown underground.

There already are 6.3 miles of tunnels downtown, and Mayor Dan Jones said a tunneling City Hall to the Central Library and Texaco-Heritage is in "the serious talking stage."

Another tunnel project, a preliminary discussion, would connect the Texas Commerce garage to the historic Rice building, which is being converted to housing after years of vacancy.

Still another project is sited for the vacant block north of Foley's department store, although federal funding has not been approved. A definite site selected.

Architects' drawings show the block could be transformed into a "Transit to Tunnel Station," with restrooms and waiting areas for bus riders, entrances to the tunnel system, each of its four corners.

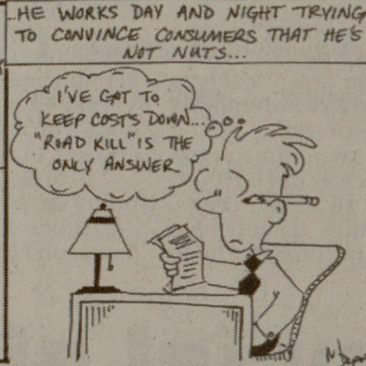

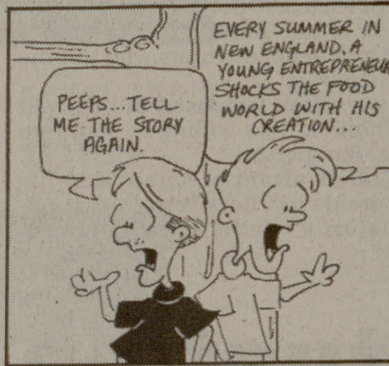

Finally, advocates of a baseball stadium and basketball arena on downtown's east side have proposed linking the system, although the tangles involved make this unlikely anytime soon.

If the stadiums are built, the tract night life as hoped, pedestrian tunnels probably could attract attendance at the pro sports events. Downtown workers could walk to games from their offices and commuting fans could get and from parking garages, sheltered from rain and heat.

Jones said a decorative plaza in the style of a Japanese garden has been proposed about 30 feet below street level on the south side of the former Houston Light Power headquarters. The city fitting the 27-floor building use mainly by the Public Works Department.

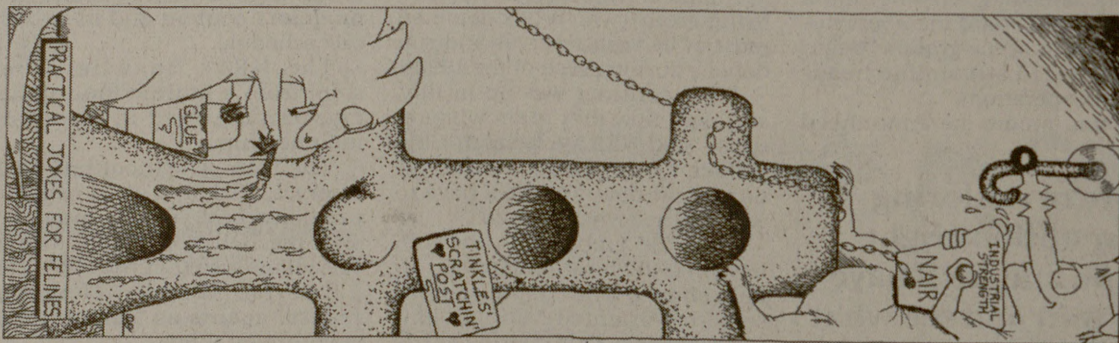

This work should be completed by early 1998, Jones said.
