"I would definitely do it again," Harvey said. "Those bad experiences were nowhere near the good experiences."

The presence of women at A&M has grown with the development of organizations and programs like social sororities, the Society of Women Engineers, and women's studies courses.

Jan Rinehart, Women in Engineering, Science, and Technology director, said women are well-represented in A&M's engineering department.

A&M ranks second nationally in the percentage of women enrolled in engineering, she said, behind the University of Puerto Rico.

The Corps of Cadets added women in 1974 with the first all-women outfit, W-1. Maj. Rebecca Ray, special assistant to the commandant, said the Corps began admitting women at a time when gender integration was a national issue.

Ray said the Corps continues to increase its appeal to women because of the heightened interest.

"One of the things they worked on is making uniforms more suitable for women," Ray said. "[And] this year, we integrated more units than last year. But Ray, who set a milestone as the first female officer on the commandant's staff for the Corps, said women find it difficult to accept women in leadership positions.

"As far as breaking down barriers, it's difficult for some of the old A&M because of the tradition," she said.
