Two car bombs claimed by IRA

BELFAST, Northern Ireland (AP) — The Irish Republican Army claimed responsibility for the double car-bomb attack on the British army's headquarters here, which wounded 31 people and brought Northern Ireland back to the brink of conflict. It was the outlawed group's first bomb attack in Northern Ireland since mid-1994. In February, it ended a 17-month cease-fire with a bombing in London; attacks followed elsewhere in Britain and a British army base in Germany. A telephone caller using a venging codeword told RTE, the Irish national broadcaster in Dublin, the IRA committed Monday's attack inside Thiepval Barracks, part of the 18,000-strong military presence in the British-ruled province. Prime Minister John Major said the claim showed the IRA had not changed. "It shows they still rely on terrorist violence and are indifferent to human life," he said. Earlier Tuesday, telephone news organizations in Belfast and Dublin that the dissident group "Continuity IRA" was responsible, but the callers provided a codeword to validate the claim. The British government had already indicated it believed the IRA land each responsible. The bombings were "certainly consistent with a terrorist organization that declared an end to a of Texas in 1994," Northern Ireland Secretary Patrick Mayhew told reporters. Whether Northern Ireland real League who no longer remains to be seen. Major on down, politicians pleaded to the province's pro-paramilitary groups to refrain from striking back. The groups, known as "loyalists" have observed a cease-fire for two years. "We must not let (the IRA) succeed," Major said. "I appeal to all loyalists not to fall into this trap." Loyalists killed more than 800 Catholics during a 25-year period, a campaign they say pushed the IRA to stop its own offensive in September 1994. A month later, the loyalist Ulster Defense Association and Ulster Volunteer Force, both rooted in militant Protestant areas, laid down their guns. Some members now feel obligated to return to eye-for-an-eye tactics. "There's still a chance we can step back from this, but in realistic terms, it's a slim chance," said David Ervine, who leads an Ulster Volunteer Force-linked party in peace talks. He urged the pro-British groups not to be provoked into action by the IRA. "The loyalists must not now do what their enemy wants them to do," Ervine said. "Don't do it." Loyalists didn't strike back after two earlier IRA-style attacks in Northern Ireland were claimed instead by "Continuity IRA," which is believed to include disgruntled IRA members. In the first attack in July, an 800-pound jeep bomb destroyed a rural hotel. Last month, a British army bomb squad defused a 250-pound car bomb abandoned near Belfast's bustling shopping district. The latest strike, in which two explosives-laden vehicles were driven past unwitting guards into Northern Ireland's most heavily guarded military installation, left experts assuming it had to be the IRA.

Yeltsin gives show of power: still in charge

MOSCOW (AP) — It's a lesson his rivals never seem to heed: Don't write off Boris Yeltsin too quickly. Roused by a new political threat from security chief Alexander Lebed and charges he wasn't really in control, the ailing president has made a flurry of top-level firings, promotions and maneuverings to show he still wields power. His actions appear to have quieted his critics, for the moment. But it was only an early test for a delicate balancing act that Yeltsin will have to maintain for months to come: staying in charge while resting in a sanitarium or hospital. Whispered speculation about Yeltsin's decline grew louder during his recent three-week hospital stay ahead of heart surgery, set for later this fall. In an attempt to allay concerns, Yeltsin made a series of taped television appearances, in which his voice was rarely heard. He was barely functioning, the talk went. He was only rubber-stamping his aides' decisions. He had suffered a stroke. Rumors aside, even his aides acknowledged he sometimes worked as little as 30 minutes a day. Lebed, who has waged a power struggle with other Kremlin insiders, complained it wasn't clear "whether we have a president or not" and called on Yeltsin to temporarily step down. A haggard but clearly alert Yeltsin — irritated by what the Kremlin described as alarmist reports — moved to reassert his authority. In radio and TV broadcasts, he assured Russians he remains on top of things and warned them not to rush to take down his portrait in the Kremlin. He complained of "petty intrigues" while he was hospitalized and publicly rebuked Lebed for arguing with everybody. "He may work 15 minutes a day, or 30, or three hours, but he is still in control," Dmitry Pinskiy, a political columnist for Itogi magazine, said. "That's the way he is made — he won't ever let power slip away." This is, after all, the president often characterized as being intoxicated with power. His recent orders have served as evidence that he's still the boss. In the last month, Yeltsin has: — Deliberately bypassed Lebed to give aide Yuri Baturin control of military promotions as head of the new Defense Council. Lebed subsequently threatened to resign. — Promoted new Defense Minister Igor Rodionov to full general, ensuring he won't have to retire when he turns 60 in December. Rodionov's rise also cuts into Lebed's potential power — a classic Yeltsin political tactic of playing underlings against each other.
