The city offers the "bikeway master plan," encouraging residents to bike to work and school in order to maintain air quality. The city also encourages residents to use the transit and shuttle bus systems to reduce vehicle emissions.

The city holds tree plantings to replace trees lost in construction and roadwork.

New businesses are required to follow city ordinances concerning landscaping and environmental precautions.

cities start programs and had ever influenced another country to start one of its own.

Volunteers of Clean Cities 2000 were invited to speak about setting up a solid waste and recycling program at a conference in Costa Rica last April.

Katie Gibson, College Station recycling coordinator, attended the conference and said being featured at the conference was a special opportunity.

"They (representatives from Costa Rica) came to visit our city and the campus and liked our programs, so they asked us to come to their country and help them set up a similar program," Gibson said. "It was a wonderful experience."

Along with the trip to Costa Rica, winning the TNRCC Award has motivated Clean Cities 2000 volunteers.

Kathryn Anthony, assistant director of public works, said the recognition in Costa Rica motivated them to continue their excellence.

"It gives us incentive to keep pursuing the program because we've been getting positive recognition," Anthony said. "It was nice to have work we have been doing be recognized."
