States consider graduated driver's licenses for teel

LANSING, Mich. (AP) — The four teen-agers were laughing and carefree as they drove past a group of joggers on a country road that rainy afternoon.

Seconds later, a tanker truck slammed into their car, leaving 15year-old Colette Barnes and two other girls dead in a pile of mangled metal.

In the 14 months since, Colette's parents have filled some of the emptiness with a crusade to spare other families from the same lem for young drivers: not alcohol tragedy. Lynda and Scott Barnes pushed a new law they think could have saved their daughter.

The law makes Michigan one of a growing number of states to establish multi-step, or "graduated," driver's licenses that slowly give teen-agers more and more driving privileges as they gain experience behind the wheel

These restrictions are aimed at what experts say is the chief probor a greater tendency to take risks, but inexperience.

The law, passed last month and effective in April, allows Michigan teens to start learning to drive at 14 3/4 instead of 15. But it has a threestep process that sets stricter requirements for training, calls for more involvement by parents and limits the hours teens may drive.

Under the new law, they will first receive a Level 1 license that, like a learner's permit, will red a parent or a licensed drive to be in the car. Sixteen-year-olds who those requirements can t Level 2 and drive alor times of the day. Between and 5 a.m., however, th drive at all unless they
